THE BOOK

OF

J O B.

THAT division of the holy scriptures upon which we now enter, is called by the Jews Chethubim, writings; or, in Greek, Hagiographa, or holy writings. The book of Job, the Psalms, and the writings of Solomon, are properly classed in this division; but the Jews include several other books, without reason or propriety. In these parts of the sacred oracles there is greater depth and apparent difficulty, than in those which precede: but the instruction is in general more immediately prepared for use; and the real benefit of perusing the scriptural history, much depends upon the degree of our previous acquaintance with the books before us. In like manner, we shall read the records of our Saviour's miracles and discourses to edification, in proportion as we have understood the epistolary part of the New Testament; which, though more difficult in many respects, conveys instruction in more direct and explicit terms.—We begin with the book of Job, which some learned men have employed much pains, ingeniously, but very unwarrantably, to interpret as an allegory. The prophet Ezekiel mentions Job, Noah, and Daniel, as three persons of eminent piety: (Ez. xiv. 14. 20 :) and the apostle James illustrates the advantages of patience by the example of Job, as he had before done his doctrine of faith and works by the examples of Abraham and Rahab. (Jam. ii. 21—25. v. 11.) No reasonable doubt therefore can remain, that the narrative of this book is historical truth; though we may safely allow that, as the discourses of Job and his friends are recorded in poetical language, their sentiments and arguments alone are transmitted to us, and not the exact words which they used in conversation. But there is no sufficient ground for questioning, whether the transactions relating to the world of spirits, good and evil, actually for substance occurred. It is indeed evident, that this could not be known, except by revelation: but as the book itself records several supernatural visions, and a glorious appearance of God himself speaking from the whirlwind; this creates no difficulty to those who consider it as true, and as a part of the sacred canon. As such, the Jews have always regarded it, though not favourable to Job, because he was a Gentile, that is, not an Israelite, or descendant of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: (Note i. 1 :) and St. Paul's manner of quoting it, with “It is written,” shews that he considered it as a part of the oracles of God. (Comp. Job v. 13. with 1 Cor. iii. 19.)—A very high antiquity is generally ascribed to this book; nay, some think it the most ancient work now extant in the world. The long life to which Job attained; the great remains of patriarchal religion in the land of Uz; the worship of the sun and moon being the only idolatry mentioned in it; and no express allusion being made to the Mosaick law, or the wonderful works of God towards Israel; with several peculiarities in the style and composition of the work, give sanction to this opinion. Some learned men indeed, perceiving a similarity of sentiment between some parts of this book, and passages in the Psalms and Proverbs, would assign it a much later origin: but wise and pious persons will often, without copying from each other, give the same instructions, and be of the same opinion; and it is at least as probable, that David and Solomon alluded to the book of Job, as that the writer of that book alluded to their works, if any intended reference be supposed.—Indeed the date of the events which it records cannot be exactly ascertained: but it is very likely, that Job was in his first prosperity, between the time when Joseph died, and the appearance of Moses in Pharaoh's court as Israel's deliverer; and the language used by God himself, that “there was none like him in all the earth,” seems to give probability to this opinion; for there is no other eminent character mentioned in Scripture as flourishing during that period.—It is not agreed, who wrote this book. Some ascribe all of it to Job himself, except the conclusion. Some to Elihu, who in one place seems to address the reader concerning his auditory. (Note, xxxii. 15—17.) But others think that Moses was the author of it. The style has likewise induced an opinion, that it was written in the Arabick language: perhaps Elihu wrote it in Arabick, and Moses rendered it into Hebrew.—The first two chapters are in prose; the style of them is very plain; and they form an introduction to the poetical part, which is in many places peculiarly figurative and sublime, and consequently more difficult to be interpreted. The latter part of the last chapter is a historical conclusion of the whole.—It cannot be clearly shewn, that this book contains any prophecies, properly so called; because the passages which might be adduced as prophetic, may also be considered as a profession of faith in the promised Redeemer, and concerning a future resurrection: but few parts of the Old Testament declare more explicitly the grand outlines of revealed truth, and even of evangelical doctrine; so that they who speak of it, as consisting chiefly of natural religion, seem to have entirely mistaken the scope of it.—It opens with an account of Job's piety and prosperity, the charge of hypocrisy and selfishness which Satan brought against him, and the permission which he obtained from God to reduce him to the deepest distress, as a trial of his integrity. It proceeds to relate how his former friends, witnessing his unprecedented sufferings, were led to condemn him as a wicked man. This gave rise to a warm controversy, whether heavy afflictions prove any person, who is apparently pious, to be a hypocrite. In disputing this point, the principles of true religion were argued from by all parties as undoubted truths, and many excellent things were spoken; but the whole had in it a sad mixture of human infirmity. When they could by no means come to an agreement upon the subject, Elihu, who had heard the debate, with great modesty and solemnity interfered; and, having first censured the other disputants for groundlessly condemning Job, he proceeded to reprove him for his improper eagerness in justifying himself, by which he had reflected on the justice of God. While he was discoursing, the Lord himself spake out of a whirlwind, and, by a discovery of his incomprehensible majesty and glory, made Job sensible of his presumption, and brought him to humble himself before him as a vile and polluted sinner. This being effected, he justified Job from the charge of hypocrisy, and condemned the conduct and language of his friends; and, having decided the controversy in favour of Job, he appointed him to sacrifice and intercede in their behalf, that they might be forgiven. The whole closes with an account of Job's deliverance, and redoubled prosperity, honour, and comfort.—It is a book full of caution and encouragement to the tempted and afflicted, and of warning to those who hastily judge their brethren. It throws great light upon the doctrine of Providence, and upon the agency and influence of evil spirits under the controul of God. We see in Job an eminent type of the suffering and glorified Saviour; and a pattern of the believer's "passing through much tribulation into the kingdom of God." In short, the whole is replete with most important instruction; and, among the rest, we are reminded of the ill effects of acrimonious religious dispute. These four pious men argued together, till, becoming angry, they censured and condemned each other, and uttered many things irreverent about the divine character and government; and, having lost their temper, would have also lost their labour, and have been more at variance than ever, if another method had not been taken of deciding the controversy.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. The land of Uz seems to have been a district of Arabia, to the south-east of Canaan; though some suppose, that it was situated in Idumea, and that Job was descended from Esau. (Marg. Ref. a.) Others think that he descended from Abraham by Keturah; yet it seems more probable that he was of the posterity of Huz, the son of Nahor. (Gen. xxii. 21.) He is supposed to have lived before any part of the scriptures was written: but he was acquainted with the truths and will of God, by tradition and immediate revelation; and so he was not a gentile, at least not a stranger to revealed truth, as many seem to suppose. The religion of Job and of his friends was evidently the same as that of the patriarchs.—He was a man of most eminent piety, upright, fervent, and steadfast in religion, and exemplary in his whole conduct; one who regarded the authority of God, revered his majesty, and habitually worshipped and obeyed him. So that he carefully avoided sin and temptation, and "exercised himself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man." His subsequent trials tended to his greater humiliation; but he was previously an eminent believer, and an excellent character.—'True, blameless, just, holy.' 'abstaining from every evil deed.' 4 And his sons went and feasted in their houses, every one his day; and sent and called for their three sisters, to eat and to drink with them.

their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt-offerings, according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually.

V. 2, 3. (Marg. Ref.)—When the earth was but thinly inhabited, it was much easier to acquire land, than to cultivate it, or to procure cattle to feed on it; (as the case still is in several parts of America, and in newly discovered countries;) so that Job's wealth is reckoned by the number of his cattle, not by the extent of his lands. He was the principal person in that country; had abundance of every thing which constituted riches among them; and acted as a magistrate, or ruler: though it does not appear that he was, properly speaking, a king, as many suppose him to have been. (Εὐγενής, Noble. Sept.)

V. 4. The sons of Job, now grown up and settled in houses of their own, cheerfully enjoyed their abundance; and, as they lived in brotherly love, they were accustomed at certain seasons to entertain each other alternately. It does not appear, that Job made one at these feasts; (2 Sam. xiii. 24, 25;) but whenever his sons met, they invited their sisters to join their company, which both shewed a proper affection for them, and evinced that no indecency or riot attended their feasting.

V. 5. As Job had, no doubt, piously educated his children, and set them an excellent example, and offered many prayers for and with them; we may suppose that they were well affected to religion. Indeed, nothing is intimated to the disadvantage of their characters, and no feasting could be more inoffensive than their's seems to have been. Yet while their pious father could not but behold their harmony and comfort with satisfaction; his knowledge of the human heart suggested a jealous fear, lest their cheerfulness should betray them into some levity or excess, some vain conversation, or some injurious thoughts of God, either tending to infidelity, to dislike of his holy worship and service, or to idolatrous love of worldly enjoyments. When therefore their feastings were ended, acting as the priest of his family, "he sent and sanctified them," reminding them to examine themselves, to confess their sins, to seek forgiveness, and to prepare their hearts to attend the ordinances of God with seriousness and humble devotion; and he offered a burnt-offering for each of them. (Notes, 1 Sam. xvi. 5. 2 Chr. xxix. 5.) Thus he taught them, that even the secret unbelief, ingratitude, and rebellion of the heart, merited condemnation, and could only be expiated by the shedding of blood, and the offering of sacrifice, in repentance and humble faith. As he did this continually, we may thence understand his unremitting care of his family, the tenderness of his conscience, his knowledge of the fallen state of man, and the depravity of human nature; his entire dependence on the mercy of God in the way which he had appointed, and his believing regard to the promised Redeemer.

Cursed God.] The word rendered "cursed," in this and several subsequent passages, in its usual meaning signifies to bless: yet it must be understood in a bad sense in this place, and when employed by Satan concerning Job. It is the same word as is used, when Naboth was accused of "cursing God and the king;" and consequently stoned as a blasphemer and traitor. 'Lest my sons in their mind have thought evil against God.' Sept. Some think this was substituted instead of the word which more generally signifies to curse, from reverence to God. Others suppose it signifies to salute, as men do when they meet, or part with others, and thus is used to denote, departing from God, or renouncing him. But the learned Mr. Leigh brings a quotation from Mr. Selden, which seems more satisfactory, and which I shall therefore translate. 'It is most certain, that the verb Barak signifies to execrate, or to curse, as well as to bless; and this, as I think, not by antiphrasis as some will have it; but almost from the very idiom of the sacred language, it may signify either way, according to the connexion in which it is used, as among the Latins sacrare and imprecari. For, as the first signifies at some times to devote any one by curses to destruction, and at others to consecrate any thing to God; and as we call for either good or evil upon others; so, Barak denotes what a man wishes or calls for, with an ardent mind, whether it be salvation or perdition. And when applied to the Deity, it either signifies addressing him by praises and thanksgivings, (which is more common,) or with revilings and reproaches; and the difference is to be collected from the nature of the case, and from the context.'—'Bless the gods, in their hearts.' El. Smith. But no mention is made in the book of Job, of any other god, or gods, except the true God; or any other idolatry, but the worship of the sun and moon. The original has not the article, and must be rendered either God, or gods, not the gods; and the clause is exactly the same as is used of the true God, in the next chapter (Note, ii. 9.)

V. 6. The holy angels no doubt are here meant by "the sons of God;" because they love him, and are beloved of him, as his children. (Marg. Ref. t.—Note, xxxviii. 4—7.) They are here introduced to our notice, as on some special occasion presenting themselves before the Lord, to give an account of their late services; and to receive further commands, in delightful obedience to which their happiness greatly consists: and Satan, the adversary of God and of his whole creation, is represented as intruding himself among them. Without determining any thing about the place or way, in which this evil spirit appeared before God, or associated with his angels; or whether the transactions of the invisible world be not described in language, adapted rather to our conceptions than to their real nature; we hence learn, that Job's extraordinary afflictions originated from the malice and agency of Satan, by divine permission for wise and holy purposes: and many truths, respecting the character and influence of the devil and his angels, are thus emphatically proposed to our attentive consideration. These apostate spirits are continually intruding into the company of the children of God on earth, especially when they meet in his ordinances, or approach his mercy-seat. And they would dare to intrude even into heaven, the habitation of God's holiness, if access were allowed them, to join the company of his holy angels: yet this would not in the least degree change their evil nature; for wherever they go, they are instigated by malice, and seeking to do mischief. But, as God is every where present, (though in heaven his glory is especially displayed,) all that is spoken upon these subjects may be literally understood, without supposing that they are ever admitted into that holy place. (Note, 1 Kings xxii. 19—23.)—'The sons of perdition came to set themselves against JEHOVAH, and the Satan (enemy) also 'came among them.' E. Smith. This most adventurous alteration, made on untenable grounds, even by the confession of Dr. Randolph the editor, contrary to the concurrent opinion of all preceding versions, critics, and expositors, shews the dangerous extent to which the sacred oracles may be altered, by an attachment to new notions, and a slight consideration of the subject.—The LXX read Οἱ ἀγγελοι τοῦ Θεου "The angels of God."

V. 7. When the holy angels had given an account of their services; Satan is represented as interrogated, Whence he came, and what he had been doing? And his answer seems to have implied an arrogant claim to be "the god and prince of this world;" and, in the spirit of pride and self-vindication, he avowed that he had been traversing his dominions, without exceeding the bounds assigned him. It also denoted his restless malice, and unwearied endeavours to do mischief. (Notes, 1 Pet. v. 8, 9.)

V. 8. Satan seemed to advance a claim to the earth as if it had been all his own; but the Lord gave him to understand, that he had a remnant of servants there: and, as this accuser had always something to urge against every believer, he was asked, whether he had fully considered Job's character and conduct. (Notes, Zech. iii. 1—4. Rev. xii. 7—12.)—The express attestation of God to Job's integrity and piety, as the most faithful servant he had at that time on earth, is sufficient to demonstrate, that he was not a self-righteous Pharisee before his afflictions; as some persons, from undue regard to system, have ventured to speak of him.

V. 9—11. Satan could not deny the excellency of Job's conduct: but he artfully insinuated, that he was mercenary in his religion, and served God, not from love to him or his ways, but for what he could get; or at least, that in his present circumstances the contrary could not be demonstrated. It was worth his while to keep up a regard to religion; for he grew rich, prosperous, and honourable by it. He had no temptation to fraud or oppression; for he had all that he could wish, in a more safe and creditable manner. He had nothing to ruffle his temper, or to render him distrustful or discontented; and therefore the reality of his faith, meekness, and acquiescence in the will of God, might fairly be questioned. In short, if duly tried, he would be found a different man: and if the Lord would himself "put forth his hand, and touch" (that is, take from him, or embitter to him,) "all that he had;" he would not only murmur and fret, which a true believer might be tempted to do; not only indulge hard thoughts of God, as Job suspected that his sons might have cursed God in their hearts; but he would openly blaspheme God and renounce religion. (Note, 5.) The last clause is literally, "If he curse thee not to thy face;" which implies that more was meant than expressed: 'If it be not so, I am greatly mistaken, or I will consent to be punished as a false witness.'—God had declared Job to be the most eminent saint upon earth; and if Satan could have succeeded in this attempt, he would really have made out his claim to the dominion over the whole human race: and though he failed, he yet had an opportunity of gratifying his malice in Job's sufferings. But with inward anguish he was constrained to confess, that he was not able to break through the hedge of continual protection, which God had placed round the person, substance, and family

12 And the LORD said unto Satan, "Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; ^ponly upon himself put not forth thine hand. ^aSo Satan went forth from the presence of the LORD.

13 ¶ And there was a day ^rwhen his sons and his daughters were eating, and drinking wine, in their eldest brother's house:

of his servant; or to give the least disturbance to the peace and blessings which Job enjoyed in his favour, and under the watchful care of his over-ruling providence.

Curse thee. (11) 'Whether to thy face he will not bless thee.' E. Smith.—'Certainly to thy face he will bless thee.' Sept. (Note, 5.)

V. 12. Thus the Lord gave Satan permission to deprive Job of all those comforts and possessions, for the sake of which he was supposed to serve him. But he would not allow the enemy to wound or to kill his body; or even to assail his soul with those horrid temptations, which evidently formed a principal part of his subsequent trials. This permission was granted, not because Job had any special need of chastisement; but that his integrity, and the power of divine grace in him, might be manifested to Satan's confusion, the real benefit of Job, the edification of the church in future ages, and the glory of God in all these respects.

V. 13. Satan knew how fearful Job was lest his sons should sin amidst their festivity; and he seems to have chosen this day for his purpose, that the calamities might be construed into divine judgments.

V. 14, 15. One messenger was spared to carry the tidings of each calamity, that the sudden and certain information, which Job received, might overwhelm his mind at once; and that he might not have time to recover himself from his consternation, or to seek support from God, of which a more gradual information would have admitted.—The servants were at their work, and lost their lives in defending their master's property.—The Sabeans were a tribe of the Arabians, who were freebooters, and infested those regions; but it is uncertain whether descended from Abraham, either by Ishmael, or Keturah. (Marg. Ref. t.)

V. 16. This servant naturally called the extraordinary lightning, which consumed all the flocks of sheep, "the fire of God;" and the expression might aid Satan's temptation, as it seemed to imply that God fought against Job, and was become his enemy. If this fire had destroyed the Sabeans with their ill-gotten booty, the divine justice would have been manifest: but that they should escape, while the servants of pious Job were slain, and the flocks destroyed, from which so many burnt-offerings had been sacrificed to the Lord, seemed very mysterious and perplexing.—We cannot determine, in what manner this and other effects were produced by Satan, who is "the prince of the power of the air;" (Note, Eph. ii. 1, 2;) and is, no doubt, able, when permitted, to cause any such phenomena. (Note, Deut. xiii. 1—5.) It is generally agreed that the tremendous appearances on mount Sinai were produced by the ministration of holy angels: and though fallen angels have lost their holy dispositions and moral powers, they retain their natural capacities; and doubtless could, if they were allowed, produce similar effects: at least, it is impossible to prove the contrary, seeing we cannot explain the manner, or ascertain the boundaries, of their operations. But they are absolutely in the Lord's hands, and can exercise their powers only by his permission; and this alone is the security of our bodies, minds, relatives, friends, and possessions.

V. 17. The Chaldeans seem at this time to have been an inconsiderable roving tribe; but they afterwards became a powerful nation. (Notes, Is. xxiii. 13. Hab. i. 5—7.)

V. 18, 19. This greatest affliction was reserved for the last, that it might drive Job desperate, when the hand of God seemed to be thus gone forth against him. The loss of one child has often been more than an affectionate parent could support with decent resignation: but for a whole flourishing family, educated with pious care, and for years insinuating into their father's affections; who were all now grown up, living in harmony, affluence, and credit, and likely to perpetuate his name and prosperity; to be all cut off at once, suddenly, and, as it appeared, by the immediate hand of God, when they were feasting, and not at their sacrifices;—this, added to all the preceding unprecedented misfortunes, was sufficient to drive most men distracted, or to urge them to bitter complaints, or even desperate imprecations. When we have endeavoured to conceive aright of Job's circumstances, comforts, and prospects, on the morning of this eventful day, and of the dreadful change which took place before evening; and when we realize, from experience and observation, the feelings of the human heart under trials comparatively trivial; we shall be able to form some faint idea of the immense load, which was at once laid upon this eminent servant of God: and the strength of his faith and grace appears, in the manner in which he supported it. And though, afterwards, the still accumulating weight extorted from him some impatient expressions, which many have inconsiderately objected to the scriptural commendation of his patience; yet, probably, no mere man ever suffered so much and so long, with equal resignation and constancy.

V. 20—22. Job acted as one who felt the weight of his afflictions; but he did not sink under them, or lose possession of his soul. (Note, Luke xxi. 19.) He expressed his inward anguish in the customary manner; and behaved, not like one furious or distracted, but with silent and reflecting sorrow. Having rent his mantle and shaved his head, he prostrated himself, and worshipped the Lord. He acknowledged, that he came into the world naked and indigent, and was no poorer after all his losses, than when he was born. He recollected that he should soon leave the world, and restore his body to the earth, from which it was taken, as the common parent of all; and that he could carry nothing away with him. He had received all from the unmerited bounty of God, who had seen good to remand his substance and his children, a little before the time when otherwise he must have left them: and his body and soul, his faith and hope, his heavenly inheritance and his God, still remained to him. Whoever were the instruments, the Lord was acknowledged as the Author of his calamities: he had no heart to revile the Sabeans and Chaldeans, and others concerned in his losses. He was assured in his judgment, whatever his feelings were, that God had a sovereign right to dispose of him and his, as he pleased; and that he had done nothing inconsistent with his infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. Instead therefore of blaspheming, as Satan had predicted, he praised, blessed, and thanked the Lord, in faith, love, and humble resignation.—Thus far he stood the trial most honourably, and did not even utter a single expression, which in any measure reflected upon the divine conduct. (Marg. reading.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

"In every nation he that feareth God, and worketh "righteousness, is accepted of him:" (Note, Acts x. 34, 35 :) and he will have some even of the wealthy and prosperous of the world to serve him; "for with God all things "are possible." (Note, Matt. xix. 23—26.)—When the heart is upright and devoted to God, the general conduct will be holy, and he will be served with the whole man; for the genuine fear of his name will produce habitual hatred of sin, and watchfulness against it.—We receive our children, as well as every other comfort, from the Lord: we ought therefore carefully to train them up for him, and to keep them from the contagion of this evil world: and we cannot but rejoice to see them grow up, living in peace and love. We should, however, be careful not to set our hearts too much upon them, as we know not how soon they may be torn from us, or made the occasions of our deepest distress; but we ought to commit them to God by constant prayer, and seek his grace to enable us to be submissive, however he may dispose of them.—It cannot be expected, but that young people will pay attention to things not directly sinful, for which their pious parents may have no relish; it is not evil in itself to rejoice in the bounty of Providence, and to use hospitality towards our friends and relatives; and it is a pleasant sight to behold the several branches of a family love and enjoy each other's company. Yet every indulgence disposes us to unwatchfulness, and forgetfulness of God: and we seldom feast together in the most friendly and decent manner, without having cause to repent of some part of our conduct and conversation; or at least of the thoughts and temper of our hearts. All that of which we are thus conscious must be washed away in the atoning blood of Christ, or it will rise up against us in judgment at the last day. We have therefore cause for continual self-examination; and after every social interview, we must bestow pains to bring our hearts into due frame for the ordinances of God. Parents also should watch over their children, and exhort, instruct, and assist them, in thus seeking an interest in the great Redeemer, and in preparing to commemorate his death at the Lord's table. The higher men are advanced in rank or authority, the more important is it, that they pay regard to these duties, for an example to their inferiors: but alas! how few of our nobles and rulers, in this Christian land, imitate Job, in this open profession of godliness, and this strict attention to religion in his family! Yet the consistent believer will attend on these things continually

V. 6—12.

No man is proved to be a true Christian by being found in company with the children of God, even when they appear before him in his house, or at his table. Could Satan enter heaven, and associate with angels, he would still remain a liar and a murderer, ambitious, subtle, envious, and malignant: and while holy spirits delighted in the service of their God, he would be plotting mischief against

CHAP. II.

Satan again appears before God, and obtains permission still farther to try Job, 1—6. He smites him with sore boils from head to foot, 7, 8. His wife moves him to curse God and die; but he rebukes her, 9, 10. Three of his friends visit him; and, overwhelmed with surprise and grief, they keep silence seven days, 11—13.

his cause and people. We should therefore enquire, not only whither we go, and what company we keep; but also, what our intentions and dispositions are.—We ought likewise to expect temptations, and that offences will continue in the church: and we should chiefly look to ourselves; for we must every one give an account of himself to God.—May we then imitate those holy and loving angels, who are “all worshipping spirits, sent forth to minister unto them who shall be heirs of salvation!”—Satan claims this earth as his domain; and alas! he has hitherto had too much ground for his arrogant pretensions: and as he continually “goeth about seeking whom he may devour,” we ought to be always sober and vigilant. But there is a remnant who are rescued from his tyranny, and are the servants of God, in whom he is glorified, and over whom he rejoices.—Those who are disposed to represent the most blameless professors of godliness, as hypocritical or mercenary; to put a bad construction upon harmless or even good actions; and to insinuate some suspicion or objection, in order to detract from the commendations bestowed upon pious and useful men; may easily know whose children they are, whose example they follow, and whose work they do. For they resemble, in every feature, Satan, the envenomed slanderer and “accuser of the brethren.” It is indeed true, that God will not suffer his people to serve him for nought. Their best interests are secured; no good thing they do shall lose its reward; and he will give them as many worldly comforts as he sees good for them. Yet every believer serves God from love, gratitude, and zeal, and delights in his holy commandments. When called to it, he will part with every temporal possession for his sake: and it is impossible that he, who loves God above all things, should fail of being eternally happy in the enjoyment of him. But untried faith is not much to be depended on. If ease, wealth, and pleasure uniformly attended piety; if there were no cross, self-denial, or temptation, to serve as a touchstone, or a furnace; it would be very difficult to distinguish the believer from the hypocrite: and therefore Satan is often allowed to sift and prove the people of God, that he may be the more confounded. (Notes, xxiii. 8—12. Luke xxii. 31—34. Jam. i. 2—4. 12. 1 Pet. i. 6, 7. iv. 12—16.) He means to destroy, defile, or distress them: but the Lord intends to demonstrate the reality and power of his grace in them, for his own glory and their important good.—Little do we know what plots are forming against us in the invisible world; nor are we sufficiently sensible of the number, power, malice, and subtlety of our unseen adversaries. We bolt and bar to keep out a few ruffians of our own species, who might come to plunder or murder us while we sleep; but there are legions of infernal spirits, whom we can by no means exclude, and who are able in a moment to distract, torment, or destroy us. Blessed be the Lord, his power limits the operations of these malicious foes; and the protection which he affords to ungodly men against their destructive rage, is a most wonderful instance of his patience and loving-kindness. Yet, as they generally disbelieve or disregard the being and agency of evil spirits, they are “taken captive by them at their will,” and are hurried on in rebellion against God. But they who love the Lord are assured of protection. Their enemies can never break through the hedge, which the Almighty God hath made around them; and even when he permits them to be tempted, neither the devil nor his emissaries can exceed the limits assigned them.

V. 13—22.

It is the delight of Satan and of all his servants to do mischief: they will go to the full length of their chain; and we do not know how far they may be permitted to practise and prosper against us. We see in the example before us, to what an extent they may be successful; and, though they are seldom allowed to proceed so far, we should be thankful that they can go no farther, and should prepare for the worst. One calamity may succeed another, and each be heavier than the preceding; they may come on us from all quarters, with every circumstantial aggravation; we may be entirely impoverished and bereaved; indeed, none can say all that we may suffer; and yet our grand interest may be safe, and all things working together for our good. But, if in all our troubles we look to our gracious God, he will repress our murmurs and support us under our afflictions. However unjust the instruments of our correction may be, he is righteous in all that is laid upon us. Our all is from his gift, we have forfeited it by sin, and ought not to complain if he take any part of it from us. We have received all our possessions, since we “came naked into this world;” and we must leave every earthly comfort and advantage when we go out of it: for they were only imparted to bear the expences of our journey, and to assist our fellow-travellers. Soon will our bodies be conveyed to the earth whence they were taken, and our souls into the eternal world: and should we be spoiled of all, and bereaved of our beloved children or friends, before we depart; we shall not live long to feel our loss, and the hopes and earnest of heaven will support us under it. May we then be enabled to “choose the good part which shall never be taken from us;” to “set our affections on things above,” and to “possess our souls in patience.” May we, after the example of Job, learn, under our lighter trials, to repress every rebellious passion; to humble ourselves before God; to adore his wise and righteous sovereignty, and to praise him for remaining mercies and prospects; and by all our troubles, to get nearer to his mercy-seat, in communion with him. Then Satan will miss his aim, and not be able by affliction to prevail with us to sin, or “charge God foolishly.” And may the malice and power of these our enemies render more precious to us that gracious and condescending Saviour, “who came to destroy the works of the devil,” and who, in order to effect our salvation, was willing to suffer from that enemy, far more than Job suffered, or than we can possibly conceive.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—3. (Notes, i. 6—19.)—Still he holdeth fast, &c. (3) Satan had been permitted to prove Job's sincerity, by the most overwhelming and sudden loss of his whole substance, and of all his children. But instead of cursing, he blessed and worshipped God. Thus he held fast his integrity, and shewed the simplicity and piety of his heart. (Note, i. 20—22.) Satan had “without cause,” moved the Lord thus to afflict his servant: for there was not the least ground for the charge of selfishness which he had lodged against him: and nothing in Job's character rendered such severe afflictions necessary, either to preserve him from ruin, or to vindicate the honour of the divine government: yet, doubtless, the Lord had wise and good reasons for his conduct; and Job, as a sinner, deserved worse than any temporal afflictions.—The word rendered destroy, signifies to swallow up; and may refer to Job's substance and family: but Satan aimed to destroy his soul also.—“But thou spakest to destroy his ‘substance in vain.’ Sept.

V. 4, 5. Satan construed Job's holy resignation into an evidence of his insensibility; as if he had been destitute of affection for his children, and regard for his servants. His life and health were preserved, and he would give any one's skin to preserve his own: he was willing therefore to compound, and part with all to save his life; so that he still kept up his religion, expecting that his other losses would be made up. Nothing could be more unreasonable and malignant than this insinuation: yet it illustrates the subtlety of that enemy, who was able plausibly to put a bad construction on Job's most unexceptionable conduct, and to impute to the basest principles, what sprang from the noblest of which the human heart is susceptible.

V. 6. ‘To prove the falsehood and malice of Satan's insinuation, God granted him permission to afflict Job in his body, in any way he chose; only he was to “save his “life.” The word is often rendered soul, and probably means that he was to preserve to him the possession of his understanding; for if he were driven distracted, and in his frenzy blasphemed, it would not be a fair trial. (Notes, i. 9—12. Ps. lxxvi. 10. Luke xxii. 31—34.)

V. 7, 8. No doubt the disease, which Satan inflicted on Job, was as painful and loathsome as it could be made. (Notes, Matt. viii. 28, 29. Luke xiii. 10—17. P. O. 10—21.) Sore boils or ulcers, (one of which is often found sufficient to exercise all our patience,) covered Job from head to foot: so that his excessive torture must have been incapable of relief from change of posture; and he would be so offensive that few would come near him. Being deprived of other relief, he took a potsherd to cleanse his sores: or perhaps when any of the boils began to die away, the itching became as intolerable, as the pain before had been; so that “he took a potsherd to scrape himself “withal:” and by this improper treatment, his disease was probably increased and prolonged, and one kind of misery alternately exchanged for another. (Notes, xxx. 15 31.)—He also “sat down among ashes.” The Septuagint renders it ‘upon a dunghill,’ and he is generally represented in that situation: the original, however, only means that he assumed the posture of a mourner and a supplicant. (Marg. Ref. r.)

V. 9. When Satan deprived Job of his children, he reserved his wife to be his tempter; perhaps knowing her to be a woman of an impatient spirit, who had great influence with her husband. She had shared the former afflictions with him; yet it is probable that she was full of hard and rebellious thoughts, though she did not openly give vent to them. But when this additional calamity oppressed Job, she was driven to despair of help, and to upbraid him as preposterous in adhering to his religion, seeing God rewarded his fidelity and resignation, with nothing but one dire calamity after another.—The meaning of her advice has been much disputed, for the Hebrew word signifies both to bless and to curse. (Note, i. 5.) But her counsel was evidently suggested by Satan, who spake by her, as he had spoken by the serpent to Eve, and by Eve to Adam: and it was therefore coincident with his temptation: (Notes and P. O. Gen. iii. 1—6;) and both her preface and Job's answer prove, that it was desperate, and not pious, advice which she gave. It is probable therefore, that our translation gives the true sense: and that Job's wife, being herself driven desperate, instigated him to despair and blasphemy, to "curse God," though he should die for so doing; or even in order to provoke the Lord thus to terminate his sufferings; or as an introduction to suicide, to which Satan no doubt would tempt him.—It is well known, that the Gentiles, under great calamities, frequently vented their rage by curses against the gods, whom at other times they worshipped.

V. 10. Considering Job's situation, nothing can be more admirable than this reply. He reproved his wife with firmness, yet with temper; and neither the anguish of his mind, nor the baseness of her suggestion, dictated any opprobrious language. He did not even address her, as a foolish, or wicked, woman; for he would not for one crime, however great, condemn her as a hypocrite. She spoke indeed "as one of the foolish women:" but he would hope it was the effect of violent temptation, and the exceeding distress of her heart; and that she would repent of this her heinous sin. "What?" says he, in astonishment at her desperate language, "shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" "Shall we, guilty, polluted, worthless creatures, receive so many unmerited blessings from a just and holy God; and shall we refuse to accept of the punishment of our sins, when we suffer so much less than we deserve, and are yet allowed to hope for a happy event? Rather let us receive the evil also, with patient submission, and even as a pledge of his love, and a means of our good."—Thus far he most honourably stood the trial, and appeared the brightest in the furnace of affliction: and the testimony here borne to his conduct, shews that he did not speak the language of passion, as many seem to think; but that of soberness and piety.—It is not said, what reception his reply met with: but the temptation was repulsed and the tempter baffled; and we read little more of his wife. (xix. 17.)

V. 11. These friends of Job seem to have been persons eminent for their rank in life, as well as for their wisdom and piety. The Septuagint call them kings, but no evidence can be adduced that they were so. Eliphaz is supposed to have descended from Teman, the grandson of Esau, by Eliphaz, whose name this his descendant bore; (Gen. xxxvi. 11. 1 Chr. i. 36:) and Bildad, from Shuah, Abraham's son by Keturah. (Gen. xxv. 2. 1 Chr. i. 32.) Zophar also sprang from some of the families, descended from Abraham. For true religion seems to have continued a considerable time in the different branches of that favoured family, even among those who were excluded from the covenant made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.—These persons, having heard of Job's great affliction, made an appointment to go to visit him and sympathize with him. Their intentions were humane, friendly, and pious; and they had doubtless been the associates of his religion in more prosperous days: yet, by their mistake of his case, they not only greatly increased his anguish; but unintentionally concurred with Satan, in tempting him to despair, and to blasphemy as its never failing effect.

V. 12, 13. Job seems to have been at this time in the open air; when his friends, astonished at what they saw, and perceiving him so altered that they could not know him, expressed their grief by every emphatical token, and burst out into loud lamentations. It should not, however, be concluded from the language here used, that he and his friends remained together in the same place, all the time preceding their debate, and during its continuance. At proper seasons they came to Job, and sat by him as mourners; but they were so affected by a view of his misery, that they remained silent before him. It is probable, they suspected that his unprecedented calamities were judgments on him for some enormous crimes, which he had veiled under a hypocritical profession of religion: but they did not choose to augment his grief, by abruptly bringing this charge against him; yet they could not use the ordinary topicks of consolation. Perhaps they conferred among themselves on the subject, and agreed to wait and observe his conduct, and to take an opportunity of speaking, as circumstances might appear to them. Perhaps also Job suspected the cause of their silence; and his anguish on that account, might give Satan an occasion of tempting him to use the passionate language recorded in the ensuing chapter, which confirmed his friends in their harsh suspicions, and gave rise to the subsequent debate.

chief: and when baffled in their attempts, they are pushed on, by pride and enmity, to still further disappointment and disgrace.—As Satan persists in accusing the people of God, notwithstanding the evidences which they give of piety and integrity: so will his servants upon earth persist in slandering them, in defiance of demonstration itself. From “their father” they learn to put a bad construction upon the best actions of good men, and to ascribe them to base motives. (Notes, John viii. 37—47.) The piety of believers is called hypocrisy; their self-denial, affectation; their liberality, ostentation; their resignation, want of natural affection; their meekness, want of spirit; and their contempt of worldly pleasure, and dislike to trifling and profane company, are ascribed to want of taste, and to a morose, unsociable disposition. But the Lord will vindicate the character of his servants; and he delights in their constancy and submission amidst trials and temptations, because they glorify the power of his grace. He will therefore, at some times, without any other peculiar cause, give their enemies permission to prove them in various ways. They mean to destroy them; but he intends to purify their hearts, to exalt their graces, and to enhance their glorious recompence: and, though the trial may be severe; yet it is the post of honour, and the event will be unspeakably happy. (Notes, Gen. i. 20. Is. x. 7. Hab. i. 12—17. Rom. viii. 35—39. 1 Pet. iv. 12—16.)—The insinuations of Satan and his factors are most dangerous, when most plausible, and when they are sophistical inferences from undoubted truths. Men are indeed naturally selfish, and prone to disregard all others in comparison of themselves, their own ease, interest, or indulgence. Hence it is evident we all need an inward and gracious change, that we may learn to love God and our neighbour. And as men will give all they have to save their lives; we should argue, that it is true wisdom to part with our property, or liberty, or country, nay, with our very lives, to secure the salvation of our immortal souls. But to infer, that all men are alike mercenary, and that the most excellent actions of pious persons spring from the same carnal and selfish principles, as the most atrocious crimes of the profane; manifests the malice of Satan himself, tends to render the vilest characters contented in their wickedness, subverts the cause of infidelity, and insinuates that all religion is pretence and imposture. Yet, who does not often hear such suggestions, from those who would not be thought to stand forth as the avowed advocates of impiety or atheism? To confute such accusations by stubborn facts, the Lord is pleased to give leave to malice, to exert her utmost power, in putting this matter to the trial; in the midst of afflictions and persecutions he enables the believer to retain his integrity; and, while the men of the world give up honour, conscience, and their souls, to save their lives, the servant of God renounces all, and even lays down his life, rather than disobey and dishonour his Lord. Thus, in innumerable instances, have the patient and constant sufferings of godly men confounded, rather than gratified, the malice of their slanderous persecutors; and proved to a demonstration an essential difference between those, who are only “born of the flesh,” and those who “are born again of the Spirit.”—We cannot know how far the Lord, in his unsearchable counsels may see fit to suffer our enemies to prevail. They may be permitted, not only to tear from us all earthly comforts, and to fill our bodies and souls with most exquisite agony; but even to seduce our beloved friends to become our tempters, or accusers: we should therefore stand prepared for trials, and “rejoice with trembling” in every external advantage.—When we are most healthy and vigorous, we should remember to what loathsome diseases our bodies are liable; and that they may shortly become a mass of putrefaction, which could scarcely be known or endured by our most affectionate friends. Instead then of being vain of them, or bestowing pains in decorating or pampering them; let us seek for the incorruptible ornaments and unfading beauties of holiness. Let us be thankful for our present measure of health, or the attendance which we receive in sickness: and let us look through the grave, to the risen and glorified Jesus, and expect his second coming, when “he shall change our vile bodies, that they may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working, whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.”—In humiliating circumstances, a humble deportment should be observed: and when we are in great pain and sickness, deserted, insulted, destitute of necessities or convenient attendance, or labouring under a complication of every distress; we should meditate on the sufferings of Job, on his patience, on the love of God to him, and on his happy deliverance: and we should also look unto the suffering Saviour, and compare our light afflictions with his unknown sufferings, “lest we be wearied and faint in our minds.” (Notes, Heb. xii. 2, 3. Jam. v. 7—11.)

V. 9—13.

The temporal comforts reserved to us, when others are removed, often prove the sources of our severest anguish. The enemy knows how to suit his temptations to our circumstances, and to send them by those persons that possess most influence over us: we should then consider, not who proposes, but what is proposed to us. (Note, Matt. xvi. 21—23. P. O. 21—28.)—No temptation is so dangerous to the afflicted, as that to despair. When a man is induced to regard God as an irreconcilable enemy, his heart naturally rises in enmity, and vents this in blasphemy; every means of grace is neglected, any crime ventured on with eagerness, and suicide may probably close the horrid career. Let us then “watch and pray, that we enter not into temptation.” (Notes, 1 Sam. xxviii. 12—25. xxxi. 3—6. Matt. xxvii. 3—5. 2 Cor. ii. 5—11.)—We ought not to judge of the Lord’s love to us, by outward events or present feelings, but should rest our hopes upon his holy word; and consider every hard thought of God, as a “fiery dart” of the enemy, which must be “quenched” without a moment’s delay, by whatever means it may have been excited. It is also desirable, to possess our souls in meekness, and to answer even our tempters with calmness and reason, as well as with decided abhorrence of sin.—None but the foolish will habitually say, that there is no ground for hope in God, nor any benefit in serving him:

none but the ungodly can deliberately persuade us to despair, blasphemy, or self-murder. But if any one who has appeared to be a pious Christian, should once, under urgent distresses, drop a hint which tends to such conclusions; we should remind him, whose work he is doing, and whose language he speaks.—Did we duly remember our sins against God, we should not wonder, that amidst our many blessings, we had also heavy afflictions: we should rather say, “It is of the LORD’s mercies that we “are not consumed;” and receive the severest of them with thankfulness as well as patience: and thus they would become our richest gain.—Those friends, who crush the afflicted believer with hard censures and suspicions, are as real tempters, as those who persuade him to blasphemy and apostasy.—It is an indispensable duty of the Christian to visit and comfort his afflicted brethren, as he has opportunity; for it is equally useful to him, as to them: and the greatest as well as the meanest should attend upon it, without shrinking from inconveniences, or disagreeables. But alas! we often prove miserable comforters of each other, augmenting instead of alleviating one another’s grief. So that our whole dependence for consolation, must be placed on God alone.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. Here the style of the book is changed to poetry, which is adorned by bold figures, according to the genius of the East. For seven days Job’s friends had come, and sat by him, without either speaking consolation to him, or mentioning their suspicions: but doubtless their distant and reserved behaviour increased his inward anguish. At the same time, we may suppose, Satan assaulted his mind with all possible temptations, to fill him with hard thoughts of God, as if he were severe, unjust, and his enemy; to shake his confidence and hope; and, by filling him with horror and dismay, to urge him to “curse God to his face.” His permission seems to have extended to this, as well as to the torturing of his body; provided he did not kill him, or deprive him of reason.—In this, Job was an especial type of Christ, whose inward sufferings, both in the garden and on the cross, are generally allowed to have been far the most dreadful, and in a great degree occasioned by the assaults of the devil in that hour of darkness: (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 36—39. Luke xxii. 39—53 :) and when Job’s trial was come to its extremity, we may conclude, that he was deprived of all comfortable sense of God’s favour, and filled with dread of his wrath. Unless we bring these inward trials into the account, we shall not readily comprehend the change which took place in his conduct, from the entire resignation of the preceding chapters, to the impatience which appears here, and in the subsequent part of the book. But this consideration solves the difficulty: Job’s inward conflict and anguish, added to all his outward sufferings, caused in-dwelling sin to work powerfully, and at length it burst forth in many improper expressions. He had long repressed the thoughts of his heart: but at last “he opened his mouth;” not, (as that expression generally imports,) to utter wise instructions, deliberately and gravely, but bitter execrations upon the day of his birth. For he vainly hoped to ease his mind by giving vent to the fire which burned within.—The experienced believer, however, knows that a few drops of this bitter cup are more dreadful than the sharpest afflictions, under which he is preserved from inward temptation, and favoured with the sweet sense of the love and presence of God. He will not therefore be much surprised, to find that Job proved himself “a man of like “passions” with others, and prone to folly and impatience; but will rejoice that Satan was disappointed, and could not prove him a hypocrite: for though he cursed the day of his birth, he did not curse his God. (Note, i. 9—11.)

V. 2—10. Here we find Job giving utterance to his anguish, by a variety of curses on the day of his birth, (a day generally remembered on its annual return, with tokens of joy,) because he would thus declare a vain wish that he had never been born. He would have the day and night, on which he was born, to the joy of his parents, expunged from the year; or at least to be one continued and dreary night. He would have it marked with tokens of God’s abhorrence, and by every terrifying appearance; that men might dread its approach, spend it in solitude, and rejoice when it was over; that it might even be such a season, as the Egyptians experienced during the plague of darkness. (Notes, Ex. x. 21. 23. Ps. lxxviii. 46—49.) He would have it cursed by those, who superstitiously marked certain days as ominous; and employed in wailings, by those who were engaged to mourn at funerals; or, as some interpret it, spent in horrid incantations, by those who dealt with Satan, and brought him up by their witchcrafts: for the original is literally, “those who are ready to raise up Le-viathan.” (Note, Is. xxvii. 1.) And all this, because the day did not prevent his being born, and, by making his mother’s womb his grave, preserve him from his present misery. (Note, Jer. xx. 14—18.)—The wildness, absurdity, and impossibility of these wishes, denote the tempest of his soul: the cruelty to his mother, whose miserable death should, as he thought, have prevented his wretched life; and the ill will to mankind to whom he would bequeath such a dreadful day, may properly be noticed: but such exclamations, being the language of passion, cannot be measured by the standard of reason. They imply, however, an ungrateful contempt of God’s gifts, and rebellion against his will; and are utterly unbecoming a sinner under a dispensation of mercy, or a believer in a state of grace. But during inward darkness and temptation, Satan so stirs up the corruption of the heart, that the plainest truths and promises are forgotten; former and present mercies are disregarded; future prospects are clouded; and the soul verges to despondency and blasphemy. Yet it is held back by the counteracting efficacy of divine grace, which subsists and operates, though it does not decidedly prevail; and thus the more dreadful effects are prevented, and in time the soul recovers its composure. (Note, Gal. v. 16—18.)—Doubtless, Job was afterwards heartily ashamed of this language: but what must his judgment of it be now, in the full enjoyment of unchangeable felicity! Does he now curse the day of his birth? Does he now wish that he had never been born? His own reproof of his wife belonged also to himself, though not in the same degree: for on this occasion he spake, as “one of the foolish men,” (Note, ii. 10;) and thus he confirmed his friends in their unfavourable opinion of him.

V. 11—19. When Job had exhausted his rhetoric in cursing the day of his birth, he next enquired, why he did not die as soon as he was born: and thus he not only murmured against God for sparing his life; but expostulated with those who were present at his birth, as if now before him, for their tender attention to him in that helpless state! For had none nursed and suckled him, when a new-born infant, he should not have lived to endure his present sufferings. The event of his afflictions, to himself, and to the church, through successive ages, fully resolves his questions, and shews for what important purposes he was preserved. But under this temptation, he thought of nothing but relief from anguish and distress: he knew that in the grave no pain was felt, and, for the moment, he scarcely looked any further; though in more lucid intervals, he expressed a faith and hope concerning the eternal world. (Notes, xiv. 7—12. xix. 23—27.) His present misery made him, at the time, think insensibility most desirable: and he amused himself with imagining, that if he had died from the womb, he should have lain as quiet in the grave, as the most mighty monarchs, conquerors, or politicians; or as the most wealthy princes, who retained nothing of their acquisitions but a desolate tomb, and were not a whit superior to a still-born infant: he considered labourers, prisoners, and slaves, as there rescued from their oppressors, free as their masters, and at rest from their labour and pain. His words indeed contain important truths: but if exemption from present suffering were all that can be expected, there would be little reason to look forward to death with comfort, or to want deliverance from the sorrows of this present life.

Built desolate places, &c. (14) Many explain this of the sepulchres, which princes and nobles often built for themselves. (Notes, Is. xxii. 16. Matt. xxvii. 57—61.)

V. 20—23. Finding the vanity of his impossible wishes, Job next complained that he was still forced to live, though weary of life: and he enquired the reason, why light, that is, life, was given to the miserable. He did not mention the name of God, perhaps out of reverence to him, for his better judgment checked the vehemence of his passion; but he evidently reflected upon him as unkind, in not at once terminating his sufferings by death. He dared not rush uncalled into the presence of his Judge, by an act of desperate rebellion and murder: (Notes, ii. 9, 10;) but he should exceedingly rejoice, if the Lord would cut him off, and be more glad of a grave than of hid treasures; and he supposed that many others were of the same judgment. (Note, vi. 8—13.) He could not conceive, that any good end could be answered by the continuance of his life: for every thing in Providence, and in the frame of his mind, was so dark and dismal, that he was like a man who had lost his way, or who was so inclosed by powerful enemies on every side, that he had no prospect of escape.—The tempter seems to have kept the thought of the eternal world from his mind: but the event fully shewed, why the Lord continued his life, both for his own good, and for that of millions.

V. 24—26. By way of apology for his vehement complaints, Job at length mentioned the excess of his sufferings. Nothing but sighs and groans occupied his time: his very food, which prolonged his miserable life, was mingled with groans, and even roarings; (Notes, Ps. xxii. 1. xxxii. 3—5;) and they flowed forth incessantly, like waters from a fountain. He was, however, conscious, that in prosperity he had not indulged carnal security; he had feared a change, and watched against those sins, in himself and his family, which might provoke the divine displeasure: (Note, i. 5:) yet his solicitude had not prevented his calamities, which equalled the worst of his fears.—His former expectation of trials, and preparation for them, should have been a comfort to him under his sufferings: but, through the power of Satan and the prevalence of corruption, this seemed an aggravation of his misery. (Note, xxvii. 7—10.)

I was not, &c. (26) This is rendered by some interrogatively; “Was I not in safety? had I not rest? was I not quiet? yet trouble came.”—This is very pathetick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

There is an essential difference between the true believer, and every hypocrite; and the former will not finally apostatize or despair: yet under urgent troubles and temptations, the evil of the heart frequently bursts forth in very culpable words and actions. None but the Saviour ever endured the extremity of anguish and temptation, without any abatement of his love, any mixture of sin, or any indications of impatience.—The pious reader will doubtless recollect seasons when, under afflictions comparatively light, his heart has risen into the same kind of peevishness, ingratitude, rebellion, and despondency, which Job discovered. Many will with shame remember, that they have conceived and uttered rash and foolish wishes not wholly dissimilar to those of Job: nay, some will be conscious, that half the burden which was laid on Job would have extorted from them still more desperate complaints; and these reflections should lay us low in humiliation before God. We should also take shame to ourselves, when we consider the folly and impossibility of those things, for which we have often wished. In our sober moments we should meditate on the consequences which would have resulted, had our vain and impatient wishes been granted, to ourselves, our relatives, and our neighbours; and we shall often find that they were unnatural and cruel, as well as impious, and destructive to our own happiness. Indeed, the habit of wishing is altogether foolish and sinful. Those wishes which respect the past, can only express our impatience: and, if the object of our desires at the present, or for the future, be lawful, we should make it the subject of our prayers; if not, we should silence ourselves and the tempter, by saying, “It is written, Thou shalt not covet.”—When our passions overpower reason, the soul becomes as a ship in a violent storm, without compass, rudder, or pilot; and, if it be possible, we ought to cast anchor till the storm subsides. Profound silence, interrupted only by ejaculations, should be observed: as we can in such a case do no good, but must get harm, by either speaking or acting; though we shall naturally be very earnest in both.—Indeed, we are born in sin, and to sorrow; and, if left to ourselves and the tendency of our own corruptions, without remedy or mercy, it “had been good for us, if we had not been born:” yet even in that case it would be diabolical rage and enmity, to charge our guilt and misery upon God, from whom “every good and perfect gift,” and nothing else, can proceed. But, blessed be his name! even “the earth is full of his goodness.” This present life may be made very tolerable, if we accommodate ourselves to our circumstances, and attend to our duty: and we are under a dispensation of mercy, and may hope for the favour of God and eternal felicity, whatever our former lives have been, if now willing to accept of Jesus Christ, as our Saviour from wrath and from sin. By “giving diligence to make “our calling and election sure,” we may obtain good evidence that we are “born of God:” and his children are heirs of everlasting glory. In that case we certainly can have no cause to “curse the day of our birth;” and if a thought of that kind intrude, we should treat it as a temptation of the enemy, and reject it immediately.—But what a day, or rather what an eternal night, will that be which awaits impenitent sinners! Condemned to outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth; banished for ever from the favour and presence of God; surrounded with horror and despair; employed in curses and imprecations; wearied of existence, and in vain longing for annihilation; and associated with the devil and his angels! That day “God will not regard from above,” no light will shine upon it for ever. Who then can help feeling the propriety, yea the necessity, of praying, “From this destruction, good Lord, deliver us!” May all, who read these remarks, take warning “to flee from the wrath to “come, and lay hold for refuge on the hope set before “us” in the gospel!

V. 11—26.

If, in this accepted time and day of salvation, we in good earnest seek and serve God, we may regard the formation of our bodies, the gift of our immortal souls, the care taken of us in infancy and childhood, and all the Lord's protection of us and long-suffering towards us ever since, as being in order to our everlasting happiness. Then indeed we may well cease to envy kings or princes, and all the wise and wealthy of the world; who will soon be levelled in the grave, with the infant which died from the womb, but who will have an awful account to render of their stewardship, before the tribunal of God. (Notes and P. O. Luke xvi. 1—13.) We should indeed habituate ourselves to view the grave without terror; for we shall there feel no pain or uneasiness, and be out of the reach of every oppressor and persecutor. But "there remaineth a" better "rest for the people of God;" a rest from sin, temptation, and conflict, and from sorrows and labours, in the immediate presence and ineffable enjoyment of God. Thence both wicked men and evil spirits will be excluded, and cease from troubling us for ever; "there the weary" will indeed "be at rest," and the poor slave and prisoner enjoy "the glorious liberty of the children of God." Nay, as far as we trust and obey the Lord Jesus, we here find rest to our souls; though "in the world we have tribulation." It is indeed far "better to depart, and to be" "with him;" but we must not undervalue life, though spent in sufferings; seeing they will work for our good at last, and some way or other subserve his glory and the good of our brethren. Let us then learn to keep the eternal world more constantly in view; that we may not be much disconcerted about temporal things.—And should any take up these pages, who are longing for death, and tempted to suicide; let them compare their present sufferings, not with the quiet of the grave, but with the scriptural declarations of the state of the damned; which must be the lot of all, who die in rebellion and despair, and by an act of deliberate murder. (Note, Ex. xx. 13, conclusion.) Let them remember that this desperation is the suggestion of the "old liar" and "murderer from the beginning;" it is the very object at which he aimed, in respect of Job, by all his temptations. Let them stop their ears to his suggestions, and hearken to the Saviour's inviting voice: let them come to him with their burdens and sorrows; and they shall find rest to their souls, and learn to bless God for temporal life as the means of eternal salvation.—Finally, in prosperity let us all watch against carnal security: and under trials let us pray for patience; looking to him, "who" "suffered being tempted, that he might be able to succour" "them that are tempted." NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. It is probable, that Job's friends had previously conferred upon his case; and suspected from his extraordinary sufferings and impatient wishes, that he was a wicked man: they therefore thought it incumbent upon them to charge this home on his conscience, in order to induce him to repentance; and Eliphaz, who seems to have been the senior of them, undertook to open the matter to him. (Note, ii. 12, 13.)—Thus, when Satan failed of proving his charge against Job, he suggested to his friends this suspicion of his hypocrisy, that they might grieve and tempt him by it. For the argument between Job and his friends, was precisely on the same point, which, at Satan's instigation, was to be decided by his behaviour under affliction; namely, whether he was a truly pious man, or a hypocrite. Satan undertook to prove him a hypocrite by afflicting him; and his friends concluded him one, because he was afflicted, and shewed impatience under his extreme sufferings. This we must keep continually in mind, if we would clearly understand the ensuing debate. (Notes, Luke xiii. 1—5.)

V. 2. Eliphaz introduced his discourse with apparent modesty; yet the abrupt manner, in which he addressed Job, shewed that he was about to censure and reprove him. He purposed to converse with Job on the subject of his extraordinary sufferings, and his despondency under them; but he was afraid he would be grieved at his words. The case, however, was urgent: for who, in such circumstances, "could refrain from words?" (Marg.) This intimated, that he thought Job extremely culpable, nay, in danger of final destruction.

V. 3—6. It seems that Job had possessed a singular talent of giving seasonable counsel and encouragement, as circumstances required. He knew how, by animating exhortations, to strengthen and comfort the desponding, that with renewed alacrity they might resume their work. He was also capable of giving suitable cautions to those, who were ready to fall into sin, and to excite them to resist the temptation. And he had assiduously improved his talent; thus becoming a blessing to many. (Notes, xxix. 7—17. Prov. x. 20, 21. xv. 4. 7. 23. xxv. 11, 12. Is. xxxv. 3, 4.) This Eliphaz allowed: and, along with due commendation, he might very properly have given Job a plain, but gentle reproof, for his present impatience, and for seeming to abandon all hope. But his application of it was too harsh; and more suited to dishearten, and even exasperate, one in Job's situation, than to convince and humble him. He certainly made much too light of Job's afflictions, as if not much greater than those, under which he had comforted others. "It is come upon thee." "It toucheth thee." He seems to have also spoken too strongly of Job's impatience. He indeed bitterly complained, and uttered many vain and rebellious wishes: but he did not faint; for then he would have yielded to Satan's temptation, and followed the counsel of his wife. (Notes, ii. 9, 10.) And in the question Eliphaz proposes: "Is not this thy fear, &c?" he appears to have expressed himself in a manner suited to give Job the idea, that he considered his former reputation for piety, confidence in God, and integrity of life, as unmerited: seeing he had now cast off all reverence of God, and hope in his mercy; and had broken out into the language of despair and rebellion. (Notes, Prov. xxiv. 10. Rom. ii. 17—24. Heb. xii. 2—8.)—Some indeed think, that Eliphaz only meant to expostulate with him on the inconsistency of his conduct; and to exhort him to reduce to practice the counsel, which he had given others; and in this emergency to support the character that he had before acquired, but was now in danger of forfeiting: but the language employed, and the subsequent speeches of him and his friends, by no means favour this interpretation.

V. 7—11. Most expositors suppose, that Eliphaz intended, in this passage, to bring a direct charge of hypocrisy and iniquity against Job; which he had only insinuated in the preceding verses. 'Eliphaz, incensed at the complaint of Job, instead of condoling with him, and pitying the miseries, which had put him into this agony, and applying fit lenitives to his anguish; bluntly rebukes him for not following the good advice he had given to others in their adversity: and tells him he had reason to suspect his piety, because the innocent were not wont to suffer such things; but only wicked oppressors, whom, though never so mighty, God had always humbled.' Bp. Patrick.—'Is not this thy storming and fretting at the hand of God a plain argument, that all thy religion, or pretended fear of God, was only upon a confidence that he would still bless and prosper thee?—I have seen and observed that men speed according to their actions, and reap the fruit of their evil doings, in evil sufferings.' Bp.

Hall. Some however think, that he did not mean to decide on his character, though his language was harsh, and implied strong suspicions; but to shew him, that, if he was not a wicked man, he had no occasion to despond, as the innocent and righteous were never left to perish; and indeed the counsel he afterwards gives, favours this interpretation. (v. 8. 17, 18.)—By "innocent," and "righteous," Eliphaz meant believers, godly men, in opposition to the profane or hypocritical. But his questions seem to imply that no such persons ever were cut off by sudden judgments, so as to perish even in this world: and thus the restoration of Job to health and prosperity, was made the test of his sincerity, or hypocrisy! Doubtless, the righteous never finally and eternally perish: but righteous Abel had been slain by wicked Cain, and many godly men had been greatly afflicted in this world: so that his general rule admitted of numerous exceptions. (Notes, ix. 22—24. xxiv. 1—12. xxvii. 13—23. Gen. iv. 6—9. Ps. lxxiii. 2—14. Ec. ix. 1—3. Jer. xii. 1—4. Ez. xxi. 2—5.)—It is indeed often seen "that they who plow iniquity and sow wickedness," (that is, who labour to be rich and great by fraud, oppression, and iniquity,) meet with a recompence in this world: the breath, or anger, of the Lord blasting all their prosperity, and consuming all their substance. And though they have been strong, courageous, and fierce as lions; yet they have been strangely defeated of their aim, and brought to ruin, with their posterity, whom they sought to exalt by cruelty and rapine. But it is not always so; nor are they the only persons who meet with grievous calamities in this life: and therefore it was uncandid to insinuate, without any proof, (as Eliphaz evidently did, though in figurative language,) that Job got his wealth by wickedness; and was spoiled of it, and bereaved of his children, by the just judgment of God upon him. (Notes, viii. 4—7. xviii. 5—21. Ez. xix. 2—9. xxii. 27, 28.)

V. 12—16. Before there was any written word of God, believers received their knowledge in divine things, either by tradition, or immediate revelation: and there is reason to conclude, that when necessary, they were generally directed in the latter way, either personally, or by their brethren. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xxxiii. 14—18.) Accordingly Eliphaz, perhaps while meditating on the case of Job, had a remarkable vision, which he supposed to be a divine confirmation of his doctrine: for the instruction was brought to him unexpectedly, and seemed apposite to the present case, as far as he was enabled to receive it.—When musing in retirement on various subjects, or on former visions with which he had been favoured, at a time when others were asleep; he was suddenly seized with excessive consternation and amazement at what he saw and heard; for a spirit, or angel, passing before him, stood still in his presence. He could not indeed describe what he had seen; but he remembered the words which were distinctly uttered, amidst the silence of the night.—It is observable that the very idea of appearances, from the world of spirits, is terrifying to the heart of fallen man: sin has broken off our original communication with it; and we instinctively dread evil from that quarter.

V. 17—21. These verses seem to contain the precise words of the spirit, who appeared to Eliphaz.—If God should punish those who did not deserve it, the innocent sufferer would be more just than his Judge, and man would be more pure, or free from blame, than his Maker. Some render it, “just before God:” but that idea is differently expressed in the original. (ix. 2. xxv. 4. Heb.—Note, xxxii. 2—5.)—And, as this supposition would be blasphemy, it must be allowed, even when we cannot perceive it, that every one deserves all that he does or shall suffer, on earth or in hell. It is therefore evidently very wrong to complain under afflictions, as if we were unjustly dealt with; or to justify our whole conduct before God, who has condemned us as sinners: and on this ground Eliphaz might fairly have reproved Job’s impatience; and exhorted him to submit to the justice of God, and to hope in his mercy, under his sufferings. Again, he was shewn, that God put no trust in any of his servants, but even “charged his angels “with folly.” Though glorious and holy creatures, they are fallible and mutable, except as upheld and confirmed by the Lord. They execute his wise and righteous counsels; but would soon shew their want of wisdom, if trusted to manage any part of the government of the world, according to their own mind. Nay, compared with the infinite knowledge and wisdom of God, they are chargeable with ignorance, being utterly unable to comprehend the vast designs of the great Creator and Lord of the universe; except as he pleases to unfold them. How much less then may man be trusted! How much more may he be charged with ignorance and folly! He dwells imprisoned in a body of clay, chained to the earth from whence it was taken, and to which it must soon return; as a poor cottage which is mouldering to the mean materials of which it is built, and about to mingle with the dust on which it has its foundation. (Note, 2 Cor. v. 1—4.) The feebleness of mankind should also be considered: they may be crushed as easily as a moth, or destroyed by the meanest insect: the destruction of the species is perpetual; men perish from the earth for ever, without any one greatly noticing so common an event. Then all their excellency vanishes: and they die without having had time to make much observation, or acquire extensive knowledge, compared with that of other intelligent beings; and very commonly without being made “wise unto salvation.” And shall such creatures presume to fathom the mysteries of Providence, to arraign the appointments of God, to charge him with injustice, or to venture an opinion on subjects, of which they can know little or nothing!—The vision was full of instruction; but the use Eliphaz seemed disposed to make of it was contrary to its leading design. Instead of condemning Job because of his sufferings; he should have inferred, that he and his friends were incompetent to decide upon the case, or to understand the deep designs of God in this mysterious dispensation.

He put no trust, &c. (18) ‘If not in his servants he will confide, and not even to his angels he will ascribe praise: ‘how much less, &c.’ Ev. Mag. Dec. 1809, p. 498. As the word rendered folly, differently pointed, is generally translated praise, perhaps this might be supported.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

We ought not needlessly to grieve the afflicted; yet, if we wisely love them, we cannot refrain from speaking those things, which we judge conducive to the good of their souls. In attempting this, however, we should aim to unite tenderness with faithfulness.—Just commendations excellently introduce needful reproofs, by preparing the mind to receive them as the result of love, and as forming a striking contrast between different parts of a man’s behaviour. But if the application is overcharged; or, if that is imputed to impiety, which springs from infirmity; it will lose its effect. It requires therefore much heavenly wisdom, to instruct, encourage, and reprove those, who are tempted and perplexed, who have fallen into sins or sufferings, and who are ready to faint, or turn aside, or yield to despondency, through disappointments and discouraging trials. Those who possess gifts suited to this work, should be diligent in it, as they have opportunity, whatever be their circumstances or employments: and the communication from the treasure of wisdom and knowledge, which God has committed to some, for the instruction and consolation of many, is at least as useful and acceptable, as the wealth that is bestowed in providing for the destitute. Yet it is more easy to counsel than to practise: and we all find, that our own arguments, encouragements, and exhortations to others, are sometimes insufficient to calm and support our own souls, in seasons of darkness and distress. It behoves us therefore to watch and pray, that we may not by our conduct defeat the effect of our instructions, and expose ourselves and the truths of God to reproach and contempt. For men will expect from us in proportion to our profession; and make fewer allowances for those who have instructed many, than for others.—Even pious friends will not always enter into our feelings, under distresses and temptations; but will count that a touch, which we feel as a mortal wound: and our infirmities may give occasion to those of our brethren, whom we most love, to suspect and censure us as hypocrites. This is one of the sharpest trials that can befall a true believer; but we should prepare to meet it. The best are fallible, and often defective in judgment and tenderness; Satan can easily poison their minds with suspicions, and the Lord may permit it for our humiliation. When this is the case, all apparent good in a man's conduct will be ascribed to corrupt motives; and all that is evil, aggravated: an irreverent expression, dictated by sudden passion, will be deemed a deliberate "casting off the fear of God;" an angry word will be termed revenge or hatred; a desponding wish will be construed into rebellion and despair; and the apparent uprightness, and professed hope in God, maintained for years, will be at once considered as presumption, selfishness, or hypocrisy. We should surely be very cautious not to concur with Satan, in thus "accusing our brethren," and urging them to renounce their confidence in God. But if it be our trial to be thus suspected and condemned, we need not wonder: better men than we have been so treated; and if we are conscious of sincerity in the midst of our infirmities, the Lord will at length plead our cause, and "make our righteousness as the noon-day." (Notes, xxiii. 8—12. Ps. xxxvii. 5—8.)—Our most dangerous mistakes are occasioned by our deducing false inferences from undeniable truth. It is certain that none ever perished being innocent; that no godly person was ever finally miserable, no impenitent sinner finally happy; that according as a man sows, so shall he reap; (Note, Gal. vi. 6—10;) and that many tyrants and oppressors, and their posterity, have been wonderfully destroyed. But it is equally true that many righteous men are heavily afflicted through life, and are suddenly cut off, and taken to heaven: while numbers of the wicked live long and prosper, die in outward peace, and leave their riches to their children; being "themselves reserved to the day of judgment to be punished." It is therefore as absurd to judge of a man's character by his outward circumstances; as to decide upon it from one single action, which is contrary to the general tenour of his life.

V. 12—21.

The written word of God speaks to us without those terrifying circumstances, which would attend an immediate communication with the world of spirits, and which even faith and communion with God would not enable us entirely to overcome: and we can review it from day to day, that we may fully receive the instruction contained in it. We may therefore be thankful for this method of knowing the will of God; nor should we regret, that we may not expect immediate revelation, and do not witness those wonders which holy men of old did. Yet the knowledge of divine truth is of such vast importance, that no terror could counterbalance the advantage of it; and they who lay aside their Bibles, or forsake the preaching of the gospel, because these make them tremble at the prospect of their guilt and danger, seem to think it better to feel, than to fear, the wrath of God.—Retirement is favourable to our intercourse with heaven: and though we must now judge of every thing by the scriptures; yet if a dream suggest a profitable hint, we should receive it with gratitude. Assuredly, were our hearts more holy, both our waking and sleeping thoughts would be more pure and heavenly.—Revelation from God is not intended to satisfy curiosity, but to excite our attention to those truths and duties, which before we knew not, or neglected. Among other important lessons we are peculiarly concerned to understand the scriptural declarations of the infinite majesty, wisdom, justice, and goodness of God; of the comparative ignorance, meanness, and weakness of the most exalted creatures; and of the guilt, pollution, folly, and frailty of fallen man; the shortness of his continuance here, and the future consequences of his conduct in this world. These truths, if well digested, will cause us to adore with profound reverence the glorious Lord of all, and to abase ourselves in the dust before him. We shall then learn to cease from all dependence on our own wisdom, strength, and righteousness, and become calm and resigned under afflictions: our objections and excuses will be silenced, and we shall be teachable and simple as little children; being disposed gladly to trust the Lord's mercy, to accept of his salvation, to yield ourselves to his will, to take the place and do the work assigned us, to prepare for death and judgment; and not to meddle with those deep matters, which are out of our reach, and beyond our scanty comprehension. But for want of this knowledge, how daringly do men impeach the wisdom, justice, and goodness of God! How do they object, murmur, justify themselves, quarrel with Providence, and reject, or explain away, the truths and precepts of revelation; as if they were more wise, righteous, and holy than their Maker! Yet it would be presumption in an arch-angel, to deem himself competent to decide on the propriety of God's unfathomable counsels, or to comprehend his vast designs; much more to find fault with his dispensations, and to dictate what it is right for him to do. "He putteth no trust in his angels," and, instead of making them his counsellors, or submitting his conduct to their judgment, he charges them with folly. How awful then is the pride and presumption of man! How great the patience of God!—But let us leave the infidel and the proud reasoner to dispute against their Maker, and the men of the world to heap up their treasures; and to obtain those supposed excellences, and climb those eminences, from which death will soon hurry them. They with these perish for ever, and die without wisdom, while scarcely and duly regard it. And let us consider, what we are, where we are, and whither we are going; and let us act accordingly;

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1. Call now, &c.] Eliphaz here challenges Job to refute his arguments, or the doctrine of his vision, by the example or opinion of any of the saints and servants of God. Let him call forth his evidence, who might answer for him in this cause; but to what saint, who ever lived on earth, would he appeal? Had any of them been so visited by divine judgments, or behaved so rebelliously under affliction?—'Nay, if an angel should appear to thee, (says Eliphaz,) as one did to me, thou wouldst have no other information but this.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 2. The wrath and jealousy, or indignation, of God bring destruction on foolish and wicked men, and not on the righteous. (Note, Prov. xxvii. 4. Jam. iii. 13—16.) Or perhaps Eliphaz, perceiving Job to be greatly agitated by his discourse, intimated that his wrath, envy, and fretfulness, would only increase his torment and shorten his days; as they often produced these effects on foolish and wicked men. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xviii. 2—4. Jon. iv. 9—11.)

Envy.] ἔνεα, indignation. (marg.) This word is rendered jealousy; Num. v. 14, &c. xxv. 11. Prov. vi. 34; and in most other places:—envy; Prov. xiv. 30. xxvii. 4. Ec. iv. 4. marg. &c.: and zeal; Num. xxv. 11. marg. 2 Kings xix. 31. Is. lix. 17, &c.—The LXX usually render it by ζηλος, which is in the N. T. translated by various words; and among the rest by indignation; Acts v. 17. marg. Heb. x. 27: and jealousy; 2 Cor. xi. 2.

V. 3—5. In these verses, Eliphaz declared the result of his former observations. He had seen wicked men, who foolishly despised the favour, and defied the wrath, of God, very prosperous for a time: but "suddenly Eliphaz "cursed," or predicted the ruin of, "their habitation:" and accordingly he had witnessed the destruction of their families, and the spoiling of their substance by hungry free-booters, notwithstanding all their care to fence it around and preserve it.—An allusion was evidently made to Job's former prosperity, to the death of his children by the falling of the house upon them, and the ruin of his substance by the Sabeans and Chaldeans. (Notes, i. 13—19. iv. 7—11.) But the most notorious wickedness does not prove, that temporal calamities will befall the perpetrator: and the application certainly was unfair and severe. (Notes, xii. 6—10. xxiv. 2—20.)

V. 6, 7. These verses may be rendered, "For affliction cometh not forth of the dust; ... Although man be born to trouble."—Man is born to labour and sorrow, as certainly, and from as natural a cause, as the sparks of fire mount upward into the air: yet the measure and duration of them result neither from chance, nor necessity, nor second causes; but from the wise and righteous appointment of God. This is a certain truth: but it does not follow that heavy afflictions are a proof of great wickedness: for the future world is the state of retributions; and afflictions in this world in general are merciful corrections, and not the effects of vindictive wrath. (Notes, 17. 2 Pet. ii. 4—9.)

V. 8—11. (Marg. Ref.) Whatever Eliphaz suspected concerning Job's previous character, it is evident he did not mean that his case was hopeless: and the advice here given was salutary and seasonable; though the manner of introducing it implies a censure, and savours of self-preference. Instead of complaints and vain wishes, Eliphaz, if in Job's case, would seek unto God, and commit his cause to him. This, on any supposition, was Job's duty and wisdom: and the subsequent discourse on the works of God was suited to remind him, that the great Lord of all could easily restore him to peace and prosperity. From the unsearchable and wonderful operations of God in the natural world, which are without number, Eliphaz selected his giving rain unto the earth. This is so common that it is scarcely noticed: and yet the manner, in which the water is conveyed, originally from the briny ocean, and distilled in small drops fit for use all over the earth, and the effects which are thus produced, are worthy of our highest admiration and most ardent gratitude. (Notes, xxxvi. 22—33. xxxvii. 1—13. Gen. i. 9. Ps. lxxv. 9—13.) By this, the barren earth, being made to yield a large increase, the poor, and those who are mourning through the dread of starving, are supplied, placed in safety, and even exalted.

V. 12—16. The speaker next noticed especially the surprising method, in which the politick counsels of worldly wise men are disappointed by divine providence; and their crafty devices, instead of accomplishing the end proposed, are turned against themselves. Being carried headlong by some unexpected incident, they involve them in utter ruin; so that they are taken in a net, and plunged into darkness or despair, just when they think success is sure: nay, they hesitate, and are bewildered, or fall into fatal errors, in the plainest matters, as if they had lost their senses. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Esth. v. 13, 14. vi. vii. 1 Cor. iii. 18—23.) By thus infatuating or ruining proud oppressors, God preserves the poor who are about to be devoured, and gives them hope of better days; while their oppressors are silenced, confounded, and dismayed, at beholding his work. As therefore, such interpositions accorded to the ordinary method of Providence, Job might with confidence expect deliverance, if he ceased from his rebellious murmurs, and humbled himself before God.

V. 17. To take vengeance on a criminal, for a warning to others, and, to correct an offender for his own good, are very distinct things, which Eliphaz had not before expressly distinguished. Job's extraordinary calamities had led Eliphaz to speak as if he had been visited in judgment: but here he indulged a hope, that he was corrected of God for his good; and if so he was a happy man, and ought not to despond under his afflictions. He exhorted him therefore, "not to despise the chastening of the Almighty."

He, who appointed his sorrows, was able to destroy and to deliver, as he pleased: Job ought therefore to consider the hand of God in these chastisements, and thankfully receive them as a token of love, and seek to profit by them. (Notes, Ps. xciv. 12—14. Prov. iii. 11, 12. Heb. xii. 4—11.)—Almighty.] Note, Gen. xvii. 1—3.

V. 18, 19. Eliphaz next shewed the benefits, which would result from a proper behaviour under afflictions, and mentioned the happiness of God's people, in language similar to that used in other parts of the Old Testament. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Lev. xxvi. 3, 4.) He observed that every wound was from the hand of God, and he alone could effectually heal it: as the skilful and tender surgeon probes and cuts in order to heal, and then binds up the wound with emollient ointments. When God smites his servants with afflictions, he heals them with consolations, or by returning ease and prosperity; and when he wounds sinners with deep convictions, he binds up the wound by a sweet sense of forgiveness, after he hath prepared them for so great a mercy. (Notes, 1 Sam. ii. 4—8. Hos. vi. 1—3.) If then Job humbly sought to God under his troubles, he would certainly be delivered: and though he might be tried repeatedly, yet he would still find relief; so that no evil would eventually come upon him.—Six troubles, and seven, denote many, one succeeding another. (Prov. vi. 16. Ec. xi. 2.)

V. 20—23. In famine, war, or perils from false witnesses and malicious slanders against his life or reputation, or amidst the ravages of wild beasts, Job might be assured of support and protection, and might smile in the midst of the most terrifying appearances: for God would so order every dispensation, that the whole animate and inanimate creation should appear to be in league with him. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. xci. 3—13. Hos. ii. 18—20. Rom. viii. 28—39.)

‘ of thy estate, all things shall answer beyond thy expectation.’ Bp. Patrick.—The word rendered “sin,” may mean wander, or be disappointed: and perhaps the verse may imply, that when the believer goes from home, he may commit himself and family to the care of God, assured that no tempests, fires, or robbers shall come near his habitation; and that he shall be brought back in peace, without losing his way, or being disappointed at his return, by finding his family ruined, or murdered, or fallen into calamity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25—27. In case Job committed his cause to God, he might also be confident that his posterity would be prosperous, that he would live long, and die in peace, when fully ripe for heaven. (Notes, xlii. 10—17. 1 Chr. xxix. 26—28.) These principles Eliphaz recommended, as the result of his own experience and observation, and those of his friends, and concluded with admonishing Job to regard them for his good, and to make them his own by a practical use of them.—They are indeed good general rules, but they admit of many exceptions: for, though the believer is under the peculiar protection of God in his person, character, family, and all relating to him, and should commit all to his keeping; the Lord often sees good to withhold the temporal comfort, in order to confer a spiritual blessing of greater value. Indeed, Job’s sufferings, so far from being proofs of hypocrisy, were not so much as corrections for any particular offence; but trials of his singular faith, piety, and constancy: so greatly did his friends mistake his case! They spoke general truths according to the light of that dispensation; but they erred in their application of them. The Holy Spirit has recorded their debate, as infallibly true in point of matter of fact: but we must decide from the general tenour of the scripture, whether they maintained right principles, and deduced legitimate consequences; and whether their arguments were or were not conclusive. (Note, xlii. 7—9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

It is generally dangerous to deviate from the sentiments and practices of the saints of God, and it is very discouraging to be constrained to act contrary to their judgment. But it is common for men to boast, as if believers, in all ages and nations, were of their mind, when they are far from having even a majority in their favour. And at last the word of God is our all-sufficient rule, and not the sentiments of any number of fallible men: so that, in fact, they have sometimes been found right, who seemed not only to have all the world, but almost all the church, against them.—We should watch ourselves, and caution others, against the tormenting and malignant passions of envy and anger; which rule in the hearts of weak and foolish men with most fatal energy, and not only expose them to the wrath of God, but to the temptations of Satan, and to various species of guilt and misery. But we must not rashly represent every gust of passion or agitation of spirit under trials, reproaches, and temptations, as an evidence of a malevolent disposition: for we should not choose to have our own infirmities treated with such severity; and we might reasonably expect that they would not.—We may predict the final ruin of wicked men, as exposed to the awful curse of God, even in the zenith of their prosperity, when all around are congratulating and envying them. Their temporal success will soon vanish: and what is got by fraud, oppression, or cruelty, commonly entails a curse on their families and estates. Yet a man’s wickedness must be very notorious, to authorize us to interpret his afflictions, or those of his posterity, into divine judgments upon him—As we are born in sin, and soon run into actual transgression, we are naturally exposed to almost innumerable troubles: but they are all directed by the unerring hand of God, for some wise and righteous purpose; and we should regulate our conduct accordingly.

V. 8—16.

It is easy to say, what we would do in trying circumstances; but perhaps we should find it more difficult to observe our own rules, than we now imagine. We ought, however, to give proper advice, and to leave the event to God: and it becomes us under all our trials to seek unto him, and to commit our cause into his hands. Whatever difficulties may be in our case, the Lord knows how to extricate us, by a thousand ways that we never thought of. All his works are wonderful and unsearchable: we see what is wrought, and can discover his wisdom, power, and goodness, in the connexion of causes and effects in nature; but we cannot comprehend how he works. And too often the great Author of all our comforts, and the manner in which they are conveyed to us, are alike unnoticed, because they are received as things of course. He exalts or depresses, afflicts or comforts, as he pleases, with irresistible power, but in perfect justice, wisdom, and goodness.—Those who are perverse and ungodly, and proud of their abilities and sagacity, are generally made to feel, or to expose, their own folly and impotency. “Professing themselves wise, they become fools:” they are often bewildered by their own fancies, and rendered the dupes of their own false reasonings or refined politicks; they run into the grossest absurdities, commit the most egregious mistakes, are bewildered in uncertainty in the plainest matters, and grope at noon day as if it were midnight; for “God takes them in their own craftiness,” and makes “foolish the wisdom of this world.” Idolaters and atheistical philosophers of old; scepticks, infidels, and materialists of modern days, are awful proofs of these truths: and so are politick persecutors and oppressors of the church, in every age.—In vain have learning, wisdom, authority, cruelty, and every device of men and devils united, to subvert the church of God, and extirpate his poor despised people. The schemes of these enemies have been frustrated, “their hands have not been able to perform their enterprize;” their “counsels have been carried headlong,” and they have been taken in their own snare, infatuated, and driven to destruction; and all their successors may expect the same fate. For the poor and despised people of God, though deemed weak, foolish, and defenceless, can neither be overcome, nor assaulted with impunity. The church still subsists; "the poor" in spirit "have hope," and expect to triumph at the destruction of their enemies, when the boastings and blasphemies of the wicked will be for ever silenced, or turned into shame and anguish.

CHAP. VI.

V. 17—27.

"Happy is the man, whom God correcteth!" We should therefore consider our afflictions, as so many kind warnings to examine ourselves, confess our sins, seek mercy from God, and walk more diligently in his ways: we should humble ourselves before him, and neither despise his rod, nor seek help or relief from any one else. He alone can effectually remove temporal afflictions, and give peace to the wounded conscience, or relief to the troubled spirit. And when we have found pardon, peace with God, and deliverance from the power of sin, we may without reserve venture our all in his hands. He will provide for our real wants, and protect us in the way of duty, so that no evil can hurt us; and deliver us from all the troubles with which he may please to prove us. Our reputations may be torn by the scourge of the slanderer's tongue; but he will hide us from the effects of such accusers, and clear up our characters in due time. Our habitations, families, and the time and circumstances of our death, may be safely trusted to him; all creatures shall be instruments of good to us, though perhaps contrary to their nature or intention; all events will benefit us; and we may smile, nay exult, when others tremble. We may go out and come in, lie down and rise up, without distrustful fear, assured of the special care of heaven, till the Lord see good to call us home. We are not authorized to expect great wealth, long life, flourishing families, or exemption from tribulations: but we are assured that all will be ordered in the best manner possible, and that we shall not be summoned by death till we are ripe for glory, and have lived as long as it is good for us in this world. This has been the confidence, observation, and experience of godly men, in all ages: may we hear it and know it for our good!

displeased, rather than convinced, by the reasonings of Eliphaz, replied, by wishing that his miseries might be impartially balanced against his complaints, assured that he should not have been so harshly censured, if his sorrows had not been made too light of: for, in fact, they were so numerous and weighty, that he could find nothing adequate with which to compare them; and all his words fell very short of fully describing them. In addition to his external troubles, the inward sense of the wrath of God, and the dread of his almighty vengeance, like poisoned arrows, infected his soul, and exhausted his courage and resolution; or, like a powerful army placed in array against him, they cut off his hope of escape, and almost drove him to distraction. (Marg. Ref.)—Doubtless, this was the effect of Satan's temptations, who endeavoured, by every horrible impression on his imagination, to drive him to curse God, or blaspheme, as he had declared that he would, if fully tried; (Notes, i. 9—11. ii. 4, 5. 12, 13;) while the Lord was pleased to favour the trial, by withholding from him all sensible comfort, and leaving him in darkness and dismay.—In this he was a type of Christ, when agonizing in the garden; and when upon the cross he exclaimed, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 36—39. xxvii. 46.)

V. 5—7. In these verses Job intimated, that his friends, being free from trouble and temptation, did nothing more, in being contented, than the wild ass or the ox does, when at ease and plentifully fed. But he must be allowed to express his anguish by groans and complaints; which were no more to be censured, than the braying of the wild ass, or the lowing of the ox, when destitute of provender. And indeed the discourse of Eliphaz had so little of the savour of wisdom and kindness, and was so unsuitable for the occasion, that it was impossible he should relish it: yet this, as "sorrowful meat" was all he had to feed his soul upon, under his affliction and depression; though at any time he should have entirely disregarded it.—Some think he meant, that it was as natural to expect encouraging words under heavy trials, as it is to ask for salt to eat with the white of an egg; whereas the discourse of Eliphaz tended to render his trials more burdensome than they were before. It is plain, however, that he rejected and undervalued the good advice which had been given; because of the injurious reflections on his character, with which it was introduced. (Notes, v. 2—7.)

V. 8—13. The passionate earnestness, with which Job here requested to die, and the vehement language which he used, were very unbecoming. It seemed as if God could bestow on him no greater favour than instantaneous death, in whatever manner it should come. (Notes, Num. xi. 11—15. 1 Kings xix. 3, 4. Jon. iv. 1—8.) This was his chief desire and request, and almost his only one: but it was very rash in him to speak of God's "destroying," or "crushing," or "letting loose his hand" and "cutting him off," and "not sparing him;" and of his "hardening himself in sorrow," and being "comforted" in the prospect of immediate dissolution. Alas! he knew not what he said; for who, during a single hour, could endure the wrath of the Almighty, if he spared not, but let loose his hand against him?—Relief from lingering misery was Job's great object; yet he evidently thought of a future world, when he declared that "he had not concealed the words of the Holy One." He meant, that he was no hypocrite; but as he had professed the words of the holy God, so he had believed and obeyed them, as the avowed and real rule of his conduct. He seems, however, to have spoken too much in a way of self-justification, and despondency; and not simply, as stating the ground of his desire to leave this world, and go to a better.—He added that he had no strength left, which could inspire a hope of a termination to his afflictions, except in death; and if he had the strength of stones or brass, his sufferings would soon wear it out: but his understanding, and the testimony of a good conscience, were continued to him; he knew what he was discoursing of, and his wisdom was not quite driven from him; yet his friends despised his words.—Though Job thus longed and prayed for death, he did not think that he was authorized to commit suicide: a heathen philosopher, or a modern unbeliever, would not have been so scrupulous. (Notes, ii. 9, 10. iii. 20—23.)

V. 14. He, who does not compassionate his afflicted friend, but reproaches him, casts off his regard to the authority of God, as well as love to his brother. (Marg. Ref.)—Some, however, understand the verse, as Job's representation of the behaviour of his friends to him; in which sense it may be rendered, "They say of him that is afflicted more than his neighbour, He hath forsaken mercy, and the fear of the Almighty." (Note, iv. 3—6.)

V. 15—23. The friends of Job had appeared very affectionate to him, when prosperous; and in his calamity he had hoped for support and consolation from their visit: but he had been miserably disappointed. This he represented by an appropriate simile. In those countries, the ice and snow, melting upon the mountains, at certain seasons filled the brooks with water, so that they appeared like rivers, swelled and discoloured with the inundation: and the Arabian companies, or caravans, travelling through the deserts, marked the course of these brooks, which were full of water when it was not wanted. But when in the heat of summer, they were parched with thirst, and resorted thither in hopes of a supply, they found that these brooks were entirely dried up, and this filled them with distress and confusion. (Note, Jer. xv. 15—18.) Thus Job's expectations from his friends came to nothing, and he was ashamed of his former confidence. (Notes, Is. xxviii. 16. xlv. 15—17. Joel i. 11.) For when his friends looked on his miseries, they seemed afraid lest he should become a burden or a disgrace to them; and therefore they treated him with unkindness. But had he ever requested them to make up his losses by presents? to rescue or ransom his substance from the Sabeans and Chaldeans?

V. 24, 25. Job was unwilling, that his friends should suppose he refused to receive instruction, or reproof. If therefore they would mildly teach him any useful lesson, or point out his mistakes, he would silently hearken. For "right words," or salutary truths, proposed with conclusive proofs and fair application, were powerfully convincing; but the unfounded suspicions and uncandid censures of Eliphaz could not be received as just reproof.

V. 26. Eliphaz had nothing explicit, for which he could reprove Job, except some passionate words, which excess of anguish had extorted from him, when almost driven to desperation. (Notes, ii. 12, 13. iii.) These ought therefore to have been no more regarded, than a sudden gust of wind, which is soon followed by a calm: or, as some understand the passage, the rest of his discourse should not on that account have been treated with contempt, as empty sound.—Had Eliphaz calmly shewed Job, that his passionate language was unbecoming his character for piety, in the manner that the latter had reproved his wife, he might have submitted to the rebuke: (Note, ii. 10:) but his intimations, that Job had been a hypocrite, entirely defeated this end, and made Job think himself excusable.

V. 27—30. In Job's opinion, his friends acted as cruelly, as if they had oppressed a fatherless child, who had none to defend him; and as ungratefully and unfaithfully, as if they had digged a pit for their friend to fall into and perish. He therefore intreated them to be content with his sufferings, which they might perceive to be very great, and not to aggravate them by reproaches; and to favour him by reconsidering his cause, examining it more accurately, and deciding upon it more candidly. If he had spoken any falsehood, they might easily confute him: if he were a wicked man, they might detect him. If they could not do either of these, let them retract their sentence, and not impute his sufferings to his iniquity; for he was conscious that he was upright in the sight of God, which would be made evident by fuller investigation. He thought he could savour what was true and good, and distinguish what was perverse and profane: and though he allowed he had spoken rash words, he was not conscious, that there had been iniquity in his tongue.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

In deciding on the conduct of those who seem impatient, we should carefully consider the number and aggravations of their distresses, which often appear to the sufferer even greater than his heaviest complaints, and beyond the power of words to express. A heart, wounded with the fear or sense of the wrath of God, assaulted with grievous temptations, filled with horror, and verging to despair, is far more dreadful and intolerable, than any external afflictions: yet, these "pains of hell" have often taken hold of the most beloved servants of God. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 5, 6 Ps. cxvi. 3.) Mere spectators cannot estimate trials of this kind; and few pious men have sufficient wisdom, experience, and tenderness, to deal properly with those, who are thus deserted, oppressed, and overwhelmed.—What then did the Saviour endure in the garden and on the cross, when "he bare our sins," and his soul was made a sacrifice to divine justice for us! and what will sinners, who neglect so great salvation, for ever endure in the regions of darkness and despair! There, indeed, "the arrows of the Almighty are within them, the poison whereof drink-eth up their spirit. The terrors of God set themselves in array against them," and they can neither escape nor endure them.—Those who know no want, and feel no pain, may easily be composed, and critically comment on the words and actions of such, as are in overwhelming trouble: but their discourses are generally insipid, and often distressing. Indeed, these in general appear worse than they really are: for in anguish a man loses his relish for truths which before were palatable; he is disposed to be fretful and fastidious; and a little which galls him sets him against all that might comfort him. This should be well considered by those, who discourse with persons in great distress: and, except they can command evident affection, sympathy, and caution, it is better to let the storm subside before they speak at all, lest they cause it to rage with still greater impetuosity.—Furious passions are peculiarly culpable when they dictate prayers; for men seldom wish or pray for death, except when they are in a rebellious frame of spirit. We should indeed be habitually ready and willing to depart; and indifferent about earthly objects, which may so soon render life itself a burden. But surely we may find something more excellent to request of God, than to be delivered from present suffering: and it ill suits our state and character, to speak of hardening our hearts under the strokes of the Almighty, if he should "not spare," but "let loose his hand to cut us off." Rather we should humble ourselves under his mighty hand; bow down in submission to his will; hope in his mercy; and intreat him to lighten the weight of his chastisements, and to consider how frail we are. In his favour we may yet have comfort, let our outward condition be ever so bad; whether he please to be with us in the furnace of affliction on earth,

CHAP. VII.

Job excuses his desire of death, by representing the vanity, misery, and uselessness of his life, 1—6. He expostulates with God, in a mixture of complaints and petitions; and concludes with confessing that he had sinned, and asking forgiveness before his death, 7—21.

until he take us unto himself, or to restore us to peace and prosperity: for “the things that are impossible with man, are possible with God.”—We may easily see that we ought to act thus under every possible trial; but if we were tempted as Job was, we know not how we should behave.—The testimony of conscience to our integrity in our past conduct, as professed Christians, may properly be our rejoicing: yet it may be so pleaded, as to savour of pride, rebellion, and despondency. It is also a mercy under severe diseases to retain the exercise of our reasoning faculties: but sometimes men use them with perverse ingenuity, to argue against their own comfort, and to vindicate their unbelief and impatience. Persons of this description, however, are entitled to our peculiar compassion; their wounds require healing balm, not sharp corrosives: and if we do not behave with tenderness to the afflicted, we despise the authority of God, and fail of our duty to him.

V. 15—30.

It is our duty and wisdom to “cease from men:” (Notes, Ps. cxlvi. 3, 4. P. O. Is. ii. 22. P. O. 10—22, close:) the nearest friends and relatives, though wise and pious, through mistake and prejudice, often disappoint our expectations. They may be exceedingly kind and attentive, while we are at ease and in affluence: yet, in adversity, we shall find most of them like the brook, which by the land-flood became a torrent, but in the drought of summer proves a dry channel, and disappoints the hopes of the fainting traveller. But they who trust in God shall never be ashamed of their confidence; for he will be peculiarly helpful to them, when all other helpers and comforts fail: yea, though “flesh and heart fail, he will be the Strength of their hearts, and their Portion for ever.”—When men see their friends cast down, they too commonly fear being involved with them, and exposed to danger, expense, and trouble; and so they appear shy of them, and perhaps unjustly criminate their conduct, to excuse their own. Yet sometimes the afflicted suspect their friends without cause.—It is our duty to help others to the utmost of our ability; but it is generally our wisdom to bear our own losses and difficulties as well as we can, and to avoid becoming a burden to our friends. Prudence therefore requires us, when prosperous, to avoid needless indulgences, and to inure ourselves to some degree of hardship; that if a change should take place, (and none can know “what a day may bring forth,”) we may not have to say, “the

But most of us are apt to be too impatient, when we hear men argue inconclusively, especially when their discourse bears hard on our sentiments and conduct. Indeed rash expressions, dictated by anguish of spirit, should not be severely criticised: but, though they do not prove us hypocrites, they evince that we are far from humbly acquiescing in the divine will. It is, however, still more unbecoming to retaliate on reprovers, and to charge them with malice, when perhaps they spoke from genuine love. Yet, if we have rashly condemned any one, we ought to review the evidence with impartiality and candour, and to retract our censure if found unmerited. We do not love to be treated as hypocrites, contrary to evidence, or the testimony of our consciences; and we should not thus condemn others. But it is best to commit our character to him who keeps our souls: and to appeal to that day, when he will “bring to light the hidden things of darkness, “and make manifest the counsels of all hearts;” and then shall every upright believer “have praise of God.”

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—6. Job here represented the life of man on earth, to be like the appointed time of warfare to the soldier, (for so the expression may be interpreted,) or the labourer’s day for his work. The one earnestly wished for his discharge, that he might be exempted from further labours and perils; the other looked with desire for the shadows of the evening, when he should receive his wages and go to rest: and why might not Job wish for death to terminate his sorrows, and bring him to that happier state for which he yet hoped? (Note, 2 Tim. iv 6—8.) This was the more allowable, as his life was now both joyless and useless, and full of tedious sufferings, without any remission even by night; for that season which brings rest to others, was spent by him in agony, and in longing for the dawning of the day: (Deut. xxviii. 67:) nay his disease was so noisome, that it made him like a putrefied corpse even before his death. (Notes, ii. 7, 8. xxx. 15—19.) All this had come upon him so suddenly, that his happier days were gone instantaneously; and his remnant of life, which in itself was exceedingly short and transient, was vanishing without hope of returning health and comfort.

V. 7—11. In the middle of this discourse with his friends, Job seems to have lifted up his thoughts to God, and mingled some actings of faith and hope with his fretfulness and despondency. He desired the Lord to remember how fleeting his life was at best; and either to abate his anguish, or release him from it, as he had no hope of seeing any more comfort here. A single look from God would end his days: and as the clouds vanish, and others are formed in their places; so men die and never return to occupy their former stations, but others succeed them from age to age.—This does not by any means imply a denial of a future state, or the resurrection of the dead; but it merely describes the condition of mankind respecting this present life. (Note, Ec. i. 4—11.)—As therefore Job could get no relief from his sufferings, he resolved to relieve his mind by venting his complaints.—If he had poured out his soul before God, that indeed would have abated the anguish of his spirit; but his expostulations only increased his vexation, and seemed to reflect on the divine justice and goodness. (Notes, 1 Sam. i. 9—16. Ps. xxxix. 1—4. lxxvii. 1—3. cxlii. 1—3. Matt. xxvi. 36—46.)

V. 12. Again addressing God, as the Author of his sufferings, Job enquired whether he were like a tempestuous ocean, or some whale, or unruly monster, that it was needful he should be restrained from doing mischief by such heavy afflictions; which confined him like chains, a prison, and a guard, so that he could not move.

V. 13, 14. It may be supposed that Satan was the author of these terrifying dreams and visions. Job, indeed, supposed that they were sent from God to enhance his distress; but God only permitted them for the trial of his faith. (Notes, Gen. xl. 6. xli. 1—8. Dan. ii. 1. iv. 4—7. Matt. xxvii. 19—23.)

V. 15, 16. Job was so weary of life, that he would have preferred any violent death to its continuance, while wasted to a skeleton, and filled with pain. Nay, he so loathed life, that he besought God to withdraw his supporting hand, and then he should expire of course. This at least seems to have been his meaning.—He would not, however, destroy his own life. (Note, vi. 8—13.)

V. 17—19. Why should the almighty God magnify such a poor worm as man, in thus contending with him, and setting his heart upon subduing him; watching his opportunities of afflicting him, or making continual trial how much he could support, without allowing him a moment's respite? (Notes, xxxiv. 10—15. Ps. viii. 4—9. cxliv. 3, 4.)—It is difficult to expound the language of one, who spoke the dictates of passion, rather than of reason, and whose soul was engaged in a continued conflict between temptation and divine grace; which alternately prevailed, and reciprocally defeated the effects of each other. (Note, Gal. v. 16—18.)

V. 20, 21. Job would not allow that he was a wicked man, or a hypocrite: yet he confessed before God, that he was a sinner; he acknowledged that he could do nothing to recover his favour; and he enquired for what cause the Lord marked him out from among his fellow-sinners, as the object of his particular displeasure, by such unprecedented calamities as rendered him "a burden to himself." (Note, xvi. 6—16. Lam. iii. 10—13.)—He called God "the Preserver of men." He is the Preserver of our lives,

CHAP. VIII.

Bildad blames Job for reflecting on the justice of God, 1—3. He intimates that his children had been cast off for their sins; yet encourages Job to seek unto God, 4—7. He appeals to the ancients, to prove the certain doom of hypocrites, 8—19. He applies the argument to the case of Job, 20—22.

and the Saviour of the souls of all that believe: but probably Job meant “the Observer of men,” for his eyes are upon the ways and upon the hearts of all men, to render to every one of them according to their deeds.—Job was also assured, that God was merciful, and that he could, consistently with his glory, pardon his transgressions and take away his iniquity; and he was very desirous of some token, that this inestimable favour was granted him. Indeed, he could not understand why God did not forgive him; and he apprehended that this mercy, if not granted soon, would come too late: for that he should, during the night, be laid in the dust, and when the Lord in the morning sought for him to shew him favour, he should not be found.—These concluding verses contain a very singular intermixture of faith and unbelief; and this renders it the more difficult to explain them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

The appointed term of our lives is known to God, but to us it is uncertain: while it continues, we have a warfare to accomplish, and a work to do; and our eternal state will be decided accordingly as we acquit ourselves. The believer, by the grace of God, “fights the good fight of “faith,” and performs his appointed service; then rests from his labours, and receives the conqueror’s crown, as a gracious recompence from the hand of his merciful Saviour.—When conflicting with sore temptations, and burdened with weighty afflictions, we may properly long after the promised rest, and welcome the shadows of the evening, the assaults of sickness, the inroads of old age, and the prospects of dissolution: yet, like valiant soldiers, or patient labourers, we should be willing to endure fatigue and hardship a little longer, and not impatiently desire release from suffering.—“Wearisome months and years in—“deed may be appointed for us:” and some eminent servants of God have had such complicated sufferings, by day and by night, as to deprive them of all ease and respite. Nay, Satan has been permitted so to harass them with temptations, when asleep as well as when awake, that the horror and anguish of their dreams have given them an idea of hell itself.—In such circumstances it cannot be expected, that the tempest-tossed sufferer should avoid all improper expressions: and as, if this were our own case, we should need tenderness and forbearance from our brethren; we should learn to make allowances for them, and behave toward them, when in distress, with candour and compassion. We should also pray earnestly not to be “led “into temptation;” and we may well loathe such an evil world as this, and be unwilling to remain in it for ever: yet life with all its sorrows, is valuable, if improved to glorify our God, to serve our generation, and to secure our own salvation. Though the Lord will prove his people,

THEN answered ^a Bildad the Shuhite, and said,

2 ^b How long wilt thou speak these things? and how long shall ^c the words of thy mouth be like a strong wind?

3 ^d Doth God pervert judgment? or doth ^e the Almighty pervert justice?

xxxiii. 17. 20. Dan. ix. 14. Rom. ii. 5. iii. 4—6. e xxi. 15. 20. xxxiv. 10—12. xxxv. 13. xl. 2. Ps. xcix. 4. Rev. xv. 3. xvi. 7.

and Satan may tempt them, and they may passionately “choose strangling rather than life;” yet grace will restrain the actings of indwelling sin, and preserve them from presumptuous and desperate wickedness; and divine consolations will in general counterbalance outward sufferings.—But how wretched is sinful man without the knowledge of a Saviour! Accumulated miseries may render life intolerable, and fears of future vengeance make the thought of death unspeakably tremendous; or, being hardened in infidelity or despair, a poor sinner may be tempted, as “choosing strangling, and death rather than life,” to plunge himself from temporal into eternal misery.—How loathsome may disease render our sinful bodies, even while we live! and death will surely return them, by putrefaction, to the dust whence they were taken. To that state we are all hastening; our days pass away swifter than a weaver’s shuttle, our lives are vanishing like the unstable cloud, and our earthly possessions will soon be in other hands. Let us then despair of seeing good on earth, except in the hope of heaven; let us without delay “seek “those things which are above;” and, instead of rebelliously murmuring at the appointments of God, and speaking “in the bitterness of our souls,” let us pour out our hearts in humble confessions of our sins, and in fervent prayers for forgiveness, and that we may be spared till fitted for a better world.—Whatever may be thought in the hour of temptation, the Lord is kind to his people; and he is doing them important good, when perhaps they are ready to conclude, that he is waiting an occasion to destroy them. His condescension and compassion to such worthless worms are infinite: he could crush us in a moment, and we all deserve it; but he visits and chastens us for our good, to exercise and prove our graces, to subdue our iniquities, and to restrain us from sin: and his mercies are far more numerous than the stripes of his correcting rod.—The Lord is our constant Observer; but he is also the gracious Saviour of all who trust in him. As we can conceal nothing from him, let us plead guilty before his throne of grace, that we may not be condemned at his judgment-seat. And we should do this earnestly; because in the grave, it will be too late to repent and seek his face. But if we wait upon him in the appointed way, the tokens of his love will in due time be vouchsafed; and we may then look forward to the hour of death, with patient submission and joyful hope.

iv. 1.) It seems that they were agreed in their judgment, concerning the case and character of Job; so that it next devolved on Bildad to answer him, and confirm the doctrine of Eliphaz.—Job had spoken important truths, though intermingled with many sallies of passion: but Bildad abruptly and harshly condemned the whole, as boisterous, unreasonable, and pernicious, like a tempestuous wind; and charged him with stating, that God perverted justice and judgment, which Job certainly did not mean to do. (Notes, xxxiv. 10—15. Gen. xviii. 23—26.)

V. 4—7. Perhaps Bildad intended to distinguish between the case of Job, and that of his children, in order to shew that there was yet hope for him, though not for them: but many think he designed to warn him, by the example of sudden vengeance thus set before him. It was, however, very unfeeling thus to introduce so distressing a subject; and still more so to intimate that his children had been cut off for their sins, and had perished in them. (Notes, i. 5. 13. 18, 19. iv. 7—11. v. 3—5.)—The language also, in which Bildad conveys his good counsel, seems to imply, that Job's integrity and piety must at least remain dubious, unless manifested by his returning prosperity: whereas, had he died of his disease, or worn out many years in penury and pain, it would have been no just impeachment of his character; especially if he had recovered the composure of his mind, in submission to the will of God. It was right, however, to exhort Job without delay, to seek and pray unto God; and to encourage him to hope for the recovery of his health and comforts, from the goodness of the Almighty; who was able to raise him, from very small beginnings, to a great increase of wealth, honour, and happiness. (Notes, v. 8—16. xxii. 21—30.)

V. 8—10. Job had slighted the discourse of Eliphaz as insipid, and his arguments as inconclusive. (Note, vi. 5—7.) Bildad therefore allowed that, by reason of the comparative shortness of their lives, they did not know so much as their fathers did, who had had longer time for making observations, and could speak more decidedly from their own heart, or experience. To their testimony therefore he appealed, and desired Job to bestow pains to examine the traditions or records, which they had preserved of their sentiments. (Note, v. 1.)—Some think that Bildad, being descended from Abraham by Keturah, had especial reference to the eminent piety and prosperity of that patriarch.—It has been observed, that Job and his friends actually possessed all that superiority of knowledge on every useful subject, especially on things relating to true religion, which has been groundlessly ascribed to the Egyptians, and others: and that they traced this knowledge back to the tradition of the fathers, or patriarchs; that is, to traditional revelation.

V. 11—19. It seems to have been Bildad's design, in this passage, to represent, by various similitudes, the apparent piety, and the fading prosperity, of the hypocrite; and to insinuate that this was applicable to the case of Job.—A rush, or flag, growing by the river's side, or in a fenny soil, flourishes while well watered: but when the mire and water fail through drought, it needs not be cut down, but withers of itself, more speedily than other herbs. Thus the hypocrite's professed religion, and confidence in God, are maintained, while worldly interests nourish them; but they come to nothing when these supports fail. Having no root of faith and grace, his piety dies away in persecution or tribulation: and, in like manner, God may often expose his hypocrisy by taking away his prosperity. (Notes, Matt. xiii. 20, 21. Jude 11—13.) This, indeed, is the proper emblem of all those who forget God; but especially of the hypocrite.—His vain confidence may also be com-

CHAP. IX.

Job acknowledges and celebrates God's justice, wisdom, power, and wonderful works, 1—13. He pared to the spider's web, spun by the insect from its own resources, with great ingenuity, and suited to answer its present purposes; but easily swept away at once, as though it had never been. (Note, Is. lix. 3—8.) Thus suitable temptations destroy the hypocrite's religion; sudden judgments tear from him all his transient prosperity; and all his endeavours to maintain either his character for piety, or his worldly consequence, by means of powerful friends and relations, prove unsuccessful. Indeed he may be compared to a tree growing in the garden, and striking root even into the rock; yet after a time cut down and thrown aside, while another is planted in its place. So wicked men, when they seem most firmly established, are suddenly thrown down, treated with neglect, and sink into oblivion and contempt; while others, from the lowest stations and of the same disposition, come in their place, whose joy in their wicked ways is equally transient and unstable.—In general, the hypocrite's religion, and the ungodly man's prosperity, having no firm support, are precarious and of short duration: yet, as to this present world, every general rule admits of many exceptions; and the illustrations adduced were wholly inapplicable to the case of Job.

V. 20—22. If Job were indeed a sound character, without guile or hypocrisy in his professed piety; (Notes, i. 1. John i. 47—51;) Bildad was assured that his prosperity and comfort would return, and his enemies would be put to shame: (Marg. Ref.) but if he were a wicked man, he would never be raised above his calamities, but would sink under them.—Bildad seems to have formed in his mind a fixed rule of Providence concerning this. Yet there was a fallacy in his reasoning, and that of his friends, arising from their not distinguishing between the present state of trial and discipline, and the future state of retributions. Hence they concluded, that Job denied the justice of God and the advantages of piety; because he maintained that, in this world, wicked men often prospered, and godly men were afflicted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Even in religious controversies, it is common for men to treat each other with acrimony, and their opponents with contempt; to overlook what is evidently good; to make the worst of what is apparently faulty; and to charge horrible consequences upon very inoffensive tenets.—There is a way, which some have, of bringing odium on the sentiments of those who oppose them, by attempting to shew that they impute injustice, cruelty, or tyranny to the Almighty, which is calculated to shock every pious mind. Truth needs not, and error ought not, to be thus defended. We are not competent to judge in most cases, what it becomes the universal and everlasting Sovereign to do. We should believe assuredly that he is just, wise, and good, in those dispensations which exceed our comprehension; and wait for the “day of the revelation of his righteous judgment” to the assembled world. Nay, even when doctrines may evidently be proved inconsistent with the divine perfections, as well as with Scripture, it becomes us to treat such subjects with great reverence, modesty, and caution. We are sure God will “not pervert judgment:” he can have no inducement to it, and it is impossible in itself. But we must not judge of characters by providential dispensations, or concur with those who condemn the afflicted. When we mention the remarkable deaths of others, we should not consider them as divine judgments, or decide on the state of their souls; except upon the most undeniable evidence of their presumptuous impenitent wickedness: and it is cruel needlessly to mention a case of this kind, however striking, in the presence of a sorrowing parent or relation. On every occasion, however, waving all topicks foreign to the subject, we should exhort the afflicted to “seek the LORD,” without delay, by earnest prayer; and we should encourage them with the prospect of returning comfort from his power and mercy. He will awake for those who sincerely repent and believe: and, though their “beginning be small, their latter end will greatly increase.”—We should, indeed, prepare diligently to enquire into the sentiments of wise men in other ages on these important subjects; especially that we may become acquainted with the experience and observations of those “elders, who through faith obtained a good report,” and which are recorded for our instruction and warning. And, notwithstanding the shortness of our lives, we may thus obtain true wisdom for our present and eternal good. But all human authority, whether of ancient fathers or modern reasoners, must be submitted to the decision of the sacred oracles.—Forgetfulness of God, and false apprehensions of him, his truth, and his will, render men either hypocrites or openly ungodly. These evils spring from a corrupt and carnal mind; and wicked men, of every description, will find that their joys and hopes must soon wither like the worthless rush, and be swept away as the spider's web, and they themselves cut down like the barren fig-tree. (Notes, Matt. iii. 7—10. Luke xiii. 6—9.) To these earthly joys and false confidences one generation succeeds after another; while millions perish without any regarding it! Thus men deceive themselves and others, and are deceived by Satan: yet every object in nature, when duly attended to, warns them not to lean on failing supports, to adopt self-devised expedients, or to rejoice in perishing comforts.—But, though the upright soul may be severely tried, God will never cast him away; and at length he shall be filled with satisfying and unfailing joy, to the confusion of his enemies who shall “perish for ever.” May we choose the portion, possess the confidence, bear the cross, and “die the death of the righteous;” and in the mean time, let us be careful neither to wound others by rash judgments; nor greatly to distress ourselves about the opinion of our fellow-servants, however eminent they may be for wisdom and discernment.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. In this answer, Job paid no regard to Bildad's severe reflections, but confined himself more to the point in hand than before. He declared, (referring to Bildad's assertion that God did not "pervert justice," viii. 3,) that he had no doubt concerning the righteousness of God in all his dispensations; nor did he mean otherwise, when he denied himself to be a hypocrite: "for how should man be just with God?" Before him he pleaded guilty of numerous transgressions; and should God contend with him in judgment, he could not justify one out of a thousand, of all the thoughts, words, and actions of his life: so that he deserved worse than all his present sufferings. But he evidently meant, that this was common to him with the best of men, and did not prove him a hypocrite, or an atrocious criminal; though his afflictions were great beyond example.

If he will, &c.] יִשְׁפַּח אֱלֹהִים, if he shall be pleased:—εἰ βούληται. Sept.

V. 4—13. Instead of cursing God to his face, (as Satan falsely asserted he would,) Job set himself to celebrate his perfections and wonderful works. He was as fully assured of the wisdom and power of God, as of his justice: he knew that none could finally prosper or be happy, who hardened themselves in rebellion against him. Indeed, opposition against him must be as foolish as impious: the Almighty, without any previous notice, is able to overturn the deep-rooted mountains, to shake the nations with earthquakes, and to remove or destroy the earth in a moment; he can forbid the sun or stars to shine, or at once extinguish their fires; he spreadeth out the heavens as his canopy, and walketh upon the stormy waves of the sea as subjected to his authority; (Note, Matt. xiv. 25—27;) and he arrangeth the constellations of the heavens, and the seasons of the year, as he pleaseth. In short, his works are incomprehensibly great, and innumerable. In all these things he acts invisibly, and on every side: he is present, though unperceived; and can crush his opponents ere they are aware. He can also take away children, wealth, health, or life; and none can hinder him, or call him to account: and if his anger be not pacified, the stoutest and proudest helpers must sink under his powerful vengeance. It would be madness therefore for feeble man to resist his will.—No allusion appears to be made in this passage, to the miraculous displays of the divine power recorded in Scripture, except it be to the convulsions of the deluge.—The names, "Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades," are taken from the Greek, and are supposed to correspond with the original words. "The chambers of the south," may mean those stars, which are seen in the southern hemisphere, but not in the northern, or those which only appear in the south at certain seasons of the year. (Notes, xxxviii. 31—41. Am. v. 7—9.)

The LXX in this place render ^{פְּלִיָּאָדָּה}, ^{אֲרִקְטֻרֻס}, and ^{אֲרִקְטֻרֻס}, by ^{πλειάδα}, ^{ἑσπερον}, and ^{αρκτουρον}, respectively.—But in xxxviii. 31, they have rendered ^{אֲרִקְטֻרֻס} by ^{πλειάδος}, ^{אֲרִקְטֻרֻס} by ^{αρκτουρος}, and ^{פְּלִיָּאָדָּה} by ^{ἑσπερον}. Hence it appears that these ancient translators had no very exact ideas of the meaning of the original words.

V. 14—21. If therefore no man could justify himself before God, or withstand his power, Job, in his present abject condition, thought himself peculiarly unfit for so bold an attempt; for his mind was confused, and he could not select apt words to express his meaning, in what he desired to speak concerning him. Even if he had been completely righteous, he would rather supplicate the favour of his Judge, than claim deliverance from his justice.

Indeed, he was so entirely disheartened, that an immediate answer to his prayer could not embolden him to hope, that God would return to him in mercy. For though conscious, that he had not given cause for it by any gross wickedness, or hypocrisy; yet God had so overwhelmed him with the tempest of his wrath; had so wounded him in body and soul, with reiterated strokes, without giving him the least breathing time; and had so filled him with bitterness; that he could not but regard him with terror. (Notes, xvi. 6—16. Ps. lxxvii. 2, 3.) At the same time, he knew that it was impossible to resist his almighty power, or to escape his omnipresence: and it would be equally absurd to think of deciding the controversy by a judicial trial; for who had authority to act as judge, and to appoint the time and place of hearing? Nay, were that possible, it would be in vain: for, if no other guilt should be charged on him, his attempt to justify himself before God, and every argument which he should use in such a cause, would condemn him as a perverse and rebellious creature. Even if not conscious of any guilt, he would not think himself free from criminality; for he did not know his own soul, as his heart-searching Judge did: and therefore he would despise his own life; and submit to any sentence, rather than contend with the Majesty of heaven. (Note, 1 Cor. iv. 3—5.)—There is in this passage a great deal of truth, as well as sound reasoning and honourable thoughts of God; yet there is also a considerable tincture of unbelief and despondency. Some hope in the divine mercy seems implied; but that attribute is not mentioned, and Job was only just supported from sinking into despair.—Those who know something of Satan's dark temptations, when the soul is filled with horrible thoughts of God, which tend to subvert the foundations of hope, will, from their own distressing experience, better understand Job's meaning, than from any unexperienced commentator. Had they at such times been urged to speak, their discourse would have contained a similar conflict between hard and honourable thoughts of God; between gloomy despondency and feeble hope; rebellious murmurs and a desire to submit, conscious that it was their duty so to do. (Notes, Jer. xx. 10—18.)—Without cause. (17) Notes, 1—3. Ps. xxv. 2, 3.

V. 22—24. Here Job lays down the precise subject, upon which he was at issue with his friends, and on which the Lord at length decided in his favour. (Note, xlii. 7—9.) He maintained against them, that the dispensations of Providence, in this world, make no exact discrimination between the righteous and the wicked; that when God scourges guilty nations, by war, famine, or pestilence, those who are comparatively innocent and truly pious, are often involved in the common calamity; and that in these sudden desolations the Lord does not wait, so to speak, to try their causes. Or Job may be understood to speak figuratively of the scourge, as laughing at distinctions in the characters of the sufferers. (Notes, viii. 20—22. Ec. ix. 1—3. Ez. xxi. 2—5.) Indeed the earth is chiefly possessed and governed by wicked men; and the judges of it are commonly blinded by their lusts, or hoodwinked by bribery, so that they frequently oppress and persecute the righteous. Yet, God gives them their power, and allows them to prosper in their crimes, by which they are still further blinded and hardened. And who is he, that can deny these facts? or maintain, in the view of them, that this is a state of exact retribution? (Notes, xii. 6—10. xxi. 7—22. Ps. xvii. 13—15. lxxxiii. 1—14. Jer. xii. 1—4. Mal. iii. 13—18.)

V. 25—35. Here Job again renewed his complaints, with the same incoherency and conflict of contending passions as before. He regarded his life, as having suddenly come to a wretched end; and with a velocity that surpassed the speed of the swiftest runner, who hasted to convey important tidings, (Note, 2 Chr. xxx. 6—9,) of the swiftest ships, and even of the eagle hasting to the prey. All his efforts to rise superior to the tumult of his passions were unavailing; he could not but fear even worse than he suffered; and as he was indeed a sinner, and his friends condemned him, he was alarmed lest God should finally reject him. If indeed he were a wicked man, it would be labour in vain to vindicate his character: for when he had done all in his power for that purpose; God would detect his secret iniquities, and thus thrust him as it were into the mire, till his very garments rendered him abhorred. Nay, though he were not a wicked man, yet the discovery of all his former sins, and of the defects of his present obedience, would shew him to be “as an unclean thing, and his “righteousnesses as filthy rags.” (Note, Is. lxiv. 6—8.) Indeed, his loathsome disease, and his other afflictions, were interpreted by his friends as proofs of his guilt, and as God’s plunging him in a ditch, and rendering him abominable; notwithstanding all the proof which he could give of his integrity. So that there was nothing to be attempted in so unequal a contest with God: there was no “day’s-man,” or umpire, to decide upon the merits of the cause, whose authority might induce submission to his award: and as to himself, he was so confused and terrified, that he could not make the best of his cause. If his afflictions and terrors were removed, he could then speak without fear: but as the case now stood he might as well hold his peace.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21.

The justice, wisdom, truth, and goodness of God, must be taken for granted, whatever sentiments we defend or oppose; for “shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?” —But “how should man be just with God?” If he enter into judgment with us according to his holy law, not one action in a thousand can stand the test.—The wisdom, power, and sovereignty of God are displayed in the works of creation and providence: we may collect what he can do from what he has done; and when these subjects are duly considered, those who harden themselves against him in presumptuous wickedness appear to be perfectly infatuated. How can those, who despise the favour and defy the vengeance of the Almighty, expect to prosper, or to escape final misery? But they are no less infatuated, who proudly attempt to justify themselves before that God, who possesses infinite purity and justice, and who knows us far better than we know ourselves. He will prove every indictment which he has brought, and vindicate every sentence which he has denounced, against any of his creatures. It is therefore our only wisdom to “supplicate mercy,” and not to demand justice, from our Judge. Every attempt “to “establish our own righteousness,” forms an additional demonstration of our pride, perverseness, and rebellion. (Note, Rom. x. 1—4.) The Lord can produce against us innumerable transgressions, which have escaped our own notice or recollection: he views us with an impartial eye, while we flatter ourselves in our own sight: he sees our iniquity to be hateful, when we are attempting to palliate it. (Note, Ps. xix. 12—14.) If then “we know nothing “by ourselves, we are not thereby justified:” and it is far better to submit to the righteousness of God, than to argue, either against the sentence of his law, or the appointments of his providence, which unitedly testify against us. In like manner, all endeavours to vindicate our character, if indeed we are hypocrites, must be in vain: we shall soon appear as if newly plunged in the mire, and be exposed to shame and condemnation, without being able to plead any thing in our own behalf. But if consciously sincere, we may humbly maintain our integrity before our fellow creatures: yet it is often lost labour, except as “by well doing, “we put to silence the ignorance of foolish men.” And it is commonly best to leave our cause with God, and patiently to bear the unjust suspicions of our brethren, till he sees good to remove the painful trial.

V. 22—35.

We should be very careful not to be offended, either by the tribulations with which we meet, or the prosperity of the wicked: they have their short-lived pleasures, we our transient sorrows. Life is hasting to a close with unobserved swiftness, and soon the joys of the world and our tears will be for ever done away. Yet, under severe trials and sharp temptations, it is very difficult to repress murmurs, to keep out hard thoughts of God, or to hold fast our confidence in him. When, through Satan’s influence on the mind, the Lord appears as an enemy; when his power and justice are more distinguishable than his mercy; and when a sense of his displeasure, and slavish fears of condemnation preponderate; the soul, even of a believer, is filled with inexpressible confusion, and verges to melancholy and despair. It is easy to counsel those who are in such a case; but who can then practise as he ought? Every object enhances terror; every topick suggests new disquietude: the trembling and tempted soul forgets the promises, or dares not appropriate them; every precept, threatening, warning, and example, seems to be pointed against him; and he scarcely ventures to approach, or knows not how to

CHAP. X.

Job intreats God to shew on what account he contended with him; and pleads for compassion as from his Creator, 1—13. He states that his sins were strictly marked and rigorously punished, 14—17. He repines, that he had ever been born, or had not died immediately after; and craves respite from pain to prepare for death, 18—22.

speaking, before the mercy-seat, where once he communed with his God in the spirit of adoption, with confidence and comfort. "This is" indeed "the time of Jacob's trouble, but" "he shall be delivered out of it." We may be thankful, if we have not known these waves and billows of dire temptations; yet we shall scarcely know how to sympathize with those that are conflicting with them, or to make proper allowances for them. But, poor tempest-tossed soul, consider Job, and notice that others have passed this dreadful gulph before thee: and though they could not believe that God would hear or deliver them any more; yet he rebuked the storm, and brought them to the desired haven. And look to Jesus, who, though free from sin, once "suffered" "being tempted, that he might be able to succour those" "who are tempted." "Resist then the devil, stedfast in" "the faith;" give not place to hard thoughts of God or desperate conclusions about thyself; repress as much as possible every passionate wish or expression, which arises in thy mind. Come to him, who invites "the weary" "and heavy laden;" and has promised "in no wise to" "cast out those who come," but "to give rest to their" "souls:" plead guilty; cast thyself upon unmerited mercy, as if this were thy first approach to a forgiving God, without deciding any thing about thy former experience or character: acknowledge that thy sufferings are less than thy sins have deserved: cry for repentance, for faith, for patience, for inward support; and wait thus at mercy's gate. There can indeed be no superior, who as umpire, can lay his hand on both parties: yet remember that there is an appointed Mediator, "an Advocate with" "the Father," who "is able to save to the uttermost all" "them who come to God by him; seeing he ever liveth to" "make intercession for them," according to the will of God: and that those who believe on him, are washed and justified from all their sins, and will soon be saved from all their troubles. In this way, thou shalt ere long find, that the tempter is rebuked, the storm is over, thy sun breaks forth; yea, thou shalt yet sing, "O LORD, I will" "praise thee; though thou wast angry with me, thine" "anger is turned away, and thou comfortest me." (Notes, Is. xii. 1—3.)—Oh, how happy is a believer even in these trying circumstances, compared with those prosperous sinners, to whom it will shortly be said, "Remember that" "thou in thy life-time receivedst thy good things, and

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. The vehemence of Job's passions, excited by his exquisite sufferings, here again broke through his better purposes; and he was urged to seek relief by complaining "in the bitterness of his soul," whatever the consequence might be: he would cease from silently musing on his misery, and would give utterance to his inward anguish.—Perhaps, "his soul being weary of life," he wished to bring some sudden judgment on himself, which might at once end his days. Yet he would still beg of God not to account him a wicked man, or finally to deal with him as such; but to shew him on what account he acted with such extreme rigour towards one of his upright worshippers.

V. 3. It may be supposed, that Job was at a loss, what to think of the divine dispensations towards him. He could not conceive that God would oppress his creatures, by punishing them without cause; as if he despised the work of his own hands, and took pleasure in destroying or disgracing it: yet he was not able to understand, how these things could consist with the goodness and mercy of God; and he supposed, that his remarkable afflictions would tend to encourage the counsels and practices of wicked men, who often argue that there is no advantage in religion, and therefore seek happiness in the world by an ungodly life. (Note, xxi. 7—16.)

V. 4—7. Man's eyes see partially, and superficially, and discern objects one after another; and his days are transient, so that he must make haste, or he may not find time to effect his purposes: but the case is entirely different with the everlasting, omniscient, and holy God. He could have detected Job's iniquity if he were guilty, without putting him to torture to extort a confession: and he had space to bring him to the trial, and to convict him, before he proceeded to punish. He could not therefore comprehend, what God meant by thus afflicting him; as he could appeal to him that he had not been wicked, that is, an impenitent, unconverted sinner; a hypocrite in religion, and one who used it as a cloke to cover his iniquities. If, however, God was pleased in sovereignty to punish him, he knew it was in vain to contend with him; for none could deliver him out of his hands.

8 Thine ^phands ^{*}have made me and fashioned me together round about: ^qyet thou dost destroy me.

9 ^rRemember, I beseech thee, that ^sthou hast made me as the clay; and wilt thou bring me ^tinto dust again?

10 Hast thou not ^upoured me out as milk, and curdled me like cheese?

11 Thou hast ^xclothed me with skin and flesh, and hast [†]fenced me with bones and sinews.

12 Thou hast granted me ^ylife and favour, and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit.

13 And these things hast thou ^zhid in thine heart: ^aI know that this is with thee.

14 If I sin, ^bthen thou markest me, and ^cthou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.

15 If ^dI be wicked, woe unto me; and ^eif I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head. ^f*I am* full of confusion; therefore ^gsee thou mine affliction;

V. 8—13. In these verses Job expostulates with God, as if he had created him only for misery. The very hands which had fashioned him, (as the potter moulds the clay on all sides, till he has formed the vessel which he intended,) now heavily afflicted him; and were about to destroy him, and reduce him to his original dust.—He then gave an accurate account of his wonderful formation in the womb. From his original liquid form he was gradually coagulated, as milk is curdled into cheese; and then the skin and the flesh covered him, till at length he was supported and braced by bones and sinews. To this material substance God had given life, and a rational soul; and thus he had been born into the world, and had ever since been protected, and favoured with a variety of comforts: and could the Lord have created, preserved, and prospered him, only to render his downfall the more dreadful, and his miseries the more extreme? Yet all his sufferings must have been the result of a secret purpose thus to overwhelm him, and the event in like manner was known to God alone.

V. 14—17. Job did not deny, that as a sinner he deserved his sufferings; but he thought that justice was executed upon him with peculiar rigour, that every sin was noticed, and that God would not mercifully acquit him from his iniquity. If indeed he were a wicked man, a notorious sinner, and hypocritical in his religion, his case must be dreadful: nay, if righteous, or an upright worshipper of God, he was so crushed and dismayed, that he should not dare to look up for mercy. Indeed he was full of confusion, and knew not what to think of his extraordinary case: yet he begged of God to notice his increasing affliction; and no longer to pursue him with his judgments and terrors, as the fierce lion hunts the trembling fugitive; nor to act toward him in so wonderful a manner. For every affliction was a witness of the divine indignation against him; and nothing but changes of one misery for another, awaited him, against whom God himself, and the whole creation, seemed to be at war.—The gloom, unbelief, and hard thoughts of God, which are here discernible, ought to be ascribed as much to Satan's temptations and Job's inward anguish of soul, as to his outward trials and remaining depravity.—The words rendered, "I am full of confusion" (15), may be translated, "Oh, be satisfied with my confusion," or "disgrace."

V. 18—22. Job here, more directly than before, expostulated with God for giving him his being, and for not cutting him off by death in the womb, or as soon as born. (Notes, iii.) He considered death as at hand; and he begged a little respite from his anguish, that he might prepare for that closing scene; and for removing to the country, whence he should not return. The description that follows, seems to be only intended for the grave, and not to relate to the invisible world.—Coherency or exactness, in the discourse of one who spoke "in the bitterness of his spirit," was not to be expected; yet it is evident, that Job believed that there would be a future state, and had some hope of happiness in it, though now exceedingly clouded and discouraged. But he here described the state of dead bodies in the grave, as darkness and disorder: and he used many repetitions; meaning in general that they know nothing of the vicissitudes of day and night, or of the orders established among the living; and that men are cited thither, and arranged there, without respect to age, rank, or character.

CHAP. XI.

Zophar sharply rebukes Job for justifying himself, and earnestly desires that God would answer him, 1—6. He shews that God is unsearchable, and man ignorant and presumptuous, 7—12. He reminds Job that repentance is the only way of recovering comfort and prosperity, 13—20.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

As afflictions may speedily render us weary of life, how needful is it to have our treasure in heaven, and to be prepared for death! Yet we should not indulge a wish to quit our post before the appointed time.—We are apt to think that we have a right to complain when we are greatly afflicted, and to imagine that it will be a relief to us. But, when we “speak in the bitterness of our souls,” we generally increase guilt and vexation, and our complaints rebound upon ourselves.—In every affliction we should examine, “wherefore God contendeth with us;” assured, that he has good and wise reasons for his conduct: and when we do not readily perceive his meaning, we ought most earnestly to intreat him to shew it to us; that we may repent of our sins, fall in with the designs of his corrections, reap the benefit of them, and escape final condemnation.—We may not be able, in some cases, to understand the reason of his appointments: but we ought not for a moment to suppose that he punishes without cause, or that his sovereignty resembles the arbitrary will of selfish and wicked men. Such thoughts originate from Satan, brooding on the enmity of our carnal hearts; and they commonly mingle with our discontent and impatience. Indeed the sovereign authority and irresistible power of God should be terrible to all the impenitent workers of iniquity, and to them alone: but if we be conscious that we truly repent, accept of proffered mercy, and desire to serve him, he will in due time end our trials and give us comfort.

V. 8—22.

The wisdom, power, and goodness of God, displayed in the wonderful formation of our bodies, and in giving us reasonable and immortal souls, and in all the mercies of our infancy, childhood, and riper years, demand our admiring, grateful praise; but in a gloomy hour, when corruption prevails, Satan can induce even a believer to admit the dishonourable apprehension, that God created and preserved him only to make him miserable! Yet all the miseries of man arise from his own voluntary wickedness: and, whatever may be hid in the decrees and counsels of God, most certain it is, that none shall eventually perish, but the finally impenitent: and our Creator (being in Christ become our Redeemer also,) will “not destroy the work of his own hands” in any humble believer; but will renew him unto holiness, that he may enjoy eternal life. But Satan plunges the tempted soul into one abyss after another: and when one blasphemous thought is rejected, another will be suggested to the mind. When any one, engaged in this conflict, is made sensible of the Lord’s righteousness in present sufferings, or even in the sentence of eternal misery denounced against sinners; he will be tempted to question the divine goodness, or to despair of mercy; to conclude that he is an exception to ordinary rules, precluded from the forgiveness reserved for others, and marked out to be treated with exact and rigorous justice. But the terror and confusion of those who are thus buffeted by Satan, is inexplicable, even by such as have had painful experience of it. Every thing then wears a gloomy aspect: all seems to testify that God is become their enemy, and is pursuing them to destruction; while one vain and foolish wish succeeds to another; and they relapse into those sallies of passion, which they have just before seen to be rebellious and vain; longing to be in any other circumstances than those in which they are placed. Yet if true grace possesses the heart, it will glimmer forth a little in their darkest hours; some feeble actings of faith and hope will be discernible; and they will be restrained from the desperate language and behaviour of an ungodly man, in similar circumstances.—But if anguish of mind on earth may render the gloomy grave a desirable refuge; what will be the condition of those who shall be condemned to the blackness of darkness for ever! There unrestrained enmity, unmingled wrath, and absolute despair, eternally reign: light only serves to shew their misery, and knowledge to augment their anguish. Let every sinner then seek deliverance from this dreadful state, and every believer be thankful to “Jesus, who delivereth us from the wrath to come.” Let all our troubles warn us of the shortness of life, remind us to pray to be spared till ready, and excite us to prepare for death, and to welcome its approach.—Having obtained the earnest and hope of heaven, we need not look with horror upon the dark and silent grave; for it cannot in the least degree harm us: and “if the Spirit of him, who raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in us, he will also quicken our mortal bodies,” and raise them up immortal and glorious.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—4. Zophar, probably the youngest of Job’s three friends, instead of being softened by his pathetick complaints, took up the argument against him with greater vehemence, than Eliphaz and Bildad had done. He represented him as a man who loved to hear himself speak; and who, by affected eloquence, aimed to run down the most evident truth in his own vindication; and as one who maintained palpable falsehoods, and treated the most sacred subjects, and most solid reasonings, with contempt and mockery. It was therefore highly proper that he should be answered, rebuked, and put to shame.—But what ground was there for these high charges? Job had said that "his doctrine was pure," which his friends could not disprove: and he was accused of saying, "I am clean in the eyes of God." He had indeed said that God knew he was not wicked, or one who concealed gross iniquities under the mask of hypocrisy; but he had also confessed himself a sinner, and implored forgiveness. And though he was tempted to question, whether God would be merciful to him, and had unadvisedly asserted that justice was rigorously exercised towards him; yet he had never supposed that God dealt unjustly with him. (Notes, vi. 27—30. vii. 20, 21. ix. 1—3. 14—24. x. 3—17. xxxiv. 5—9. xxxv. 1—3.)

V. 5, 6. Zophar despaired of convincing Job; and therefore wished that God would interpose to vindicate his truth, and the justice of his providence: for if God should shew him the secret, wise, and righteous reasons of his dispensations; or the extensive and spiritual nature of true holiness, and consequently the number and heinousness of his sins, all of which were vastly more than he had any conception of; he would acknowledge that God exacted less punishment of him than he deserved.—This Job would not have denied: and when God afterwards did speak, it was in behalf of Job, and not against him. (Notes, xxiii. 3—7, xxxi. 35—37. xxxiii. 1—11. xlii. 7—9.) —Secrets. (6) Marg. Ref.—Note, Ps. xxv. 14.—Double, &c. 'For in the wisdom and justice, or according to the law of God, thou mightest suffer double to what thou now dost; and know thou that, &c.' (Ezra ix. 13. Notes, Ps. ciii. 10. Lam. iii. 21—23.)

V. 7—12. These animated interrogations were intended to convince Job, that the nature of God is incomprehensible, and his judgments unsearchable; since there is an infinity in his perfections, and in his counsels, which no similitude can represent to our imaginations, and no reasonings or researches fully explain to our understandings.

But this important truth, instead of militating against Job's doctrine, condemned the rashness of his friends, who inferred his guilt from his calamities, as if they had found out the secrets of the divine wisdom to perfection, whereas they had not the least conception of the real reason of his unprecedented sufferings! (Notes, iv. 17—21.)—Zophar added, that if God were pleased to cut off a man's family, (or rather, to alter the course of things), to shut him up in prison, or to gather armies against him, none could hinder him; that he knew the vanity and folly of men, and saw and considered the most secret wickedness of their lives or hearts; and so had good reasons for punishing even those who appeared to be righteous. He declared that man, ignorant and short-sighted as he is, has an ambition of being wise and knowing, is curious and presumptuous, and proud of his understanding, and the depth of his penetration; though in fact he is born as uninformed as the wild ass; and like that animal, he fiercely scorns subjection and confinement, aims at independence and liberty in indulging his appetites; and is therefore very incompetent to the acquisition of divine wisdom and knowledge. Or, being obstinate and headstrong like the wild ass's colt; nothing can make him wise to know his place and duty, but severe discipline and painful experience. The closing verse, however, is variously interpreted, and does not necessarily imply all that is suggested by our version of it; but may literally be rendered, "That empty man may become considerate: though man be born as the colt of a wild ass." 'But a vain man (a fool,) will become wise, when the wild ass's colt is born a man.' E. Smith.

V. 13—20. Here Zophar, after the example of Eliphaz and Bildad, exhorted Job to repentance, and gave him great encouragement, yet mixed with irritating insinuations. (Notes, v. 17—27. viii. 20—22.) If, instead of vindicating himself, he would, with due preparation of heart, humble himself before God, and stretch out his hands in fervent prayer to him; if he repented of his wickedness, and did “works meet for repentance;” he might obtain forgiveness, and stand with confidence before God, who would clear his character, restore his health, and establish him in prosperity: so that his misery would be forgotten, or only remembered as a cause of gratitude. Then his old age would shine with a brighter light of divine favour and felicity, than either his youth or more mature years had done: secure of the protection of God, and rejoicing in hope of future blessedness, he might order all his affairs with comfort and confidence, and would close his life in reputation and usefulness. But disappointment, vexation, and ruin, inevitably awaited all wicked men: and their very hope would soon expire, as a dying man gives up the ghost.—There was, however, no certain ground on which to conclude, that Job’s deepest repentance and the Lord’s most gracious forgiveness, must be followed by outward prosperity; nor any reason to regard him as a hypocrite, if he died in his present calamitous condition.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Nothing is more unbecoming, or more common, than acrimony and reviling in religious controversy. Opposition stirs up pride and resentment in the hearts even of godly men; the credit of the victory insensibly becomes the object; and an opponent must be represented as a dangerous and wicked man, that he may without censure be exposed to ridicule or hatred. But in fact, a multitude of empty words neither require nor deserve an answer; and specious reasonings are best opposed by conclusive arguments. Those who accuse others of falsehood and deceit, are commonly the first to transgress: and men often shame themselves by their invectives and misrepresentations, in attempting to put others to shame; or they manifest their own pride, when they would represent the sentiments of others, as mockery of the truth. Such as maintain error are often most ready to appeal to God, and to express a high confidence that they are pleading his cause: and in the eagerness of dispute, the most important truths will be adduced in support of those very principles of which they are subversive. Yet we should endeavour to profit by truth, though we disapprove of the spirit with which it is maintained.—We ought often to meditate on the incomprehensible perfections and works of God, that we may be made sensible of our own meanness, ignorance, and vileness. Some little of his wisdom, justice, and goodness in the government of the universe, we may discover by faith, from revelation; enough indeed to shew us sinners, that our severest temporal sufferings are “less than our iniquities deserve,” and so to render us patient and thankful under them: but the secrets of his wisdom, which we can never search out to perfection, infinitely exceed our narrow capacities. (Notes, xxvi. 14. xxviii. 23—28. Deut. xxix. 29.) In this abyss our thoughts and reasonings are swallowed up: the height, and depth, and length, and breadth of all his attributes pass knowledge: and our province is to believe, adore, and love. It is in vain for us to dispute against his omnipotent sovereignty; nor can we escape his omnipresent and infinite knowledge: but it behoves us to consider who and what we are, and to remember that we are born in sin, and children of wrath, and in some respects resemble the untractable wild ass. We should then give up our proud desire of comprehending the deep things of God; and of measuring his truths, judgments, and decrees, by the rule of our short-sighted reason. Our wisdom consists in preparing our hearts to seek his mercy and favour; to repent of our sins; to accept of his mercy and salvation; and to pray earnestly for his sanctifying grace, that we may “cast away all our transgressions,” and devote to him our bodies, our souls, and substance, and rule our families in his faith and fear. Thus, “being justified by faith, we shall have peace with God,” and confidence before him: and a quiet conscience, “joy in the Holy Ghost,” an affiance in a wise and kind providence ordering all for our good, with the lively hope of eternal felicity, will give comfort and steadfastness to our souls. So shall we forget our misery, as waters that pass away; the light of God’s countenance will render our declining years more pleasant, than those early days that were spent in youthful gaiety; we may then rest in safety, and the work of our hands shall be established unto us. Trials may interrupt our happiness, but cannot destroy it; nay, they will tend to increase it: we shall become truly honourable and useful; and may at length lie down in the grave without fear, and bid an eternal farewell to pain and sorrow, at that period, when the expectation and enjoyment of the ungodly shall eternally expire. For “the wicked is driven away in his wickedness; but the righteous hath hope in his death.” (Note, Prov. xiv. 32.)

men of understanding in the world, and when you die, no wisdom will remain on earth; but men will sustain an irreparable loss, being bereaved of such oracles of divine knowledge! Yet he thought that he had some understanding of these matters, and did not fall below them: and indeed any body might know such things as they had advanced, as far as there was truth in them.

V. 4. Here again Job retorted upon Zophar, who had spoken of him as a *mock*er: but indeed his friends treated his sufferings, character, and discourse with contempt, and reviled an upright man, who had long been an accepted worshipper of God, as if he were a hypocrite.—‘ You deride your friend, when you bid him call upon God, that he may answer him: but this is no new thing, for the best of men have been mocked on this fashion.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 5. Though a man have shone “ as a light in the world,” by wisdom, piety, or usefulness, while in affluence; yet as soon as he sinks into poverty or distress, he will generally be despised by the rich and prosperous: and they will mark every one of his mistakes or faults with severity, to justify their neglect of him. ‘ He that is near to his ruin, (as I now am,) is (to those that prosper and are at ease) like unto a lamp that is near burning out unto the snuff; and therefore despised by them for the present, however it have formerly shined.’ Bp. Hall.—(Note, Ps. cxxiii. 3, 4.)

V. 6—10. Job here opposes facts to hypothesis. It cannot be denied, that audacious robbers and oppressors, and the most impious wretches, are often prospered in Providence, and have riches abundantly in possession. (Notes, ix. 22—24. xxi. 7—16.) The matter is so plain, that the whole creation testifies it. The animal tribes generally subserve the pride, luxury, and indulgence of ungodly men: the earth, and its richest produce, is their property; and all nature drudges, as it were, to pamper their lusts. (Note, Rom. viii. 18—23.) Yet this is not to be ascribed to fortune, or chance: but the Lord orders these things as he pleases; seeing the life and breath of man, and of every creature, are entirely at his disposal.

V. 11, 12. The ear of man (that is, the understanding to which the report of the senses is made,) was formed, that, by attention to what is spoken, it might distinguish truth from falsehood, and right from wrong; as the palate distinguishes tastes. But Job probably thought, that the distinguishing faculty of his friends must be obtuse, or vitiated by prejudice; otherwise they could never reject truths so obvious as those which he had stated to them. Indeed, aged men, who have had long opportunity of making observations, are supposed to be wiser than others; but he intimated, that his friends had lived long to little purpose, as they were egregiously mistaken in so plain a matter.

V. 13—25. The transition from the foregoing verse to this subsequent discourse seems as follows. The consideration, that “ length of days ” among men was supposed to increase wisdom and understanding, led Job to think of the everlasting God, whose wisdom and knowledge are infinite: and thus, without mentioning him, he proceeded to expatiate on his perfections and dispensations; shewing that he believed the same general truths as his friends did, and could discourse upon them with cogency and fluency.

(Notes, v. 8—16. xi. 7—12.) He declared God to be the Fountain of knowledge, wisdom, and power; and that his providence rules the world with irresistible authority. He destroys cities and imprisons the inhabitants: he afflicts the land with drought; or overflows it with a deluge, as he did the earth in the days of Noah. (Notes, Gen. vii.) The crafty deceivers, and those who are deluded by them, fall in with his universal plan for his own glory; and even Satan, the great deceiver, accomplishes the purposes of God by his malignant endeavours to defeat them! Kings and legislators, conquerors and orators, are disgraced, overthrown, and infatuated, beyond all expectation, as the Lord pleases: and they are sure to be at length rendered contemptible when they oppose his cause. (Notes, Is. ii. 10—18. xxiii. 8, 9. Dan. iv. 34—37. Acts xii. 20—23.) He detects the most secret conspiracies, and the deepest intrigues of princes: he disposes of nations with absolute authority; and when any stand in his way, he throws them into such confusion, that they are perfectly bewildered, as if lost in a desert, or groping in the dark, or staggering from drunkenness; and thus they become incapable of the least effectual exertion.—These important truths were suited to convince the over-confident disputants, that they had gone out of their depth, in attempting to assign the Lord's reason for afflicting Job; when "his judgments are unsearchable, and his ways past finding out." (Note, Rom. xi. 33—36.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

Reviling, raillery, and boasting, commonly prove infectious: and when we over-rate ourselves and court admiration, others will be disposed to undervalue us, and treat us with contempt. Whatever some men may think to the contrary, there certainly was good sense, sound reasoning, true knowledge, and heavenly wisdom in the world, before they were born; and the world will not be left in the dark, when these luminaries are set, and their labours also consigned to oblivion. Nay, when wise and good men die, blessed be God, wisdom does not die with them, but others are raised up in their places.—We have all a right to judge for ourselves, being endued with understanding as well as others: and we should neither claim superiority over them, nor in this respect yield it to them; for we are cautioned by our Lord on both sides, when he says, "Call no man father upon earth;...neither be ye called masters:" but in other matters our rule is, "in honour to prefer others," and to "sit down in the lowest place;" and it is seldom wise or becoming to deviate from it. (Notes, Matt. xxiii.

8—10. Luke xiv. 7—11.)—The most pious and conscientious men have generally been treated with contempt by worldly persons; and sometimes by their brethren, who ought to have sympathized in their sorrows, borne with their infirmities, and helped them with their prayers. But if men despise them, let them but call upon God and he will answer them.—Adversity and poverty, in this evil world, eclipse the light of wisdom and piety; and many, who once were honourable and useful, have sunk into contempt, when fallen under misfortunes and become indigent.—Yet worldly prosperity is of small value in the sight of God. He has superior blessings for his children; and commonly he gives carnal things abundantly into the hands of those, whose pride, luxury, and impiety are increased by them.—The whole creation groans, as in unnatural bondage to the lusts of men. Every creature preaches the goodness of God, and the ungrateful abuse of man; and testifies that this is a state of probation, and not of retribution.

The faculties of our souls were originally formed, as capable of discerning truth and falsehood, as our bodily senses are of discriminating their objects.—Observation and experience should teach us wisdom. But, through the effects produced on the powers of the mind by the fall of man, connected with our prejudices, and the influence of our sinful passions, we draw wrong conclusions, make a perverse choice, and often wander farther from God and true wisdom as our years increase. Yet, when being renewed by the Holy Spirit, we begin to use our faculties aright; we receive wisdom from the Fountain-head by faith and prayer; we learn useful lessons from all we see and experience; and acquire a spiritual taste, which savours truth and holiness, and is of use every hour of our lives. (Note, Heb. v. 11—14.) May we seek more and more to have "the eyes of our understanding thus enlightened," and "our senses exercised, by reason of use, to discern both good and evil!"—It is a main point of wisdom to set God always before us, to observe his working in every thing, and to feel our own absolute dependence on him. "He doeth what he will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" He creates or destroys, he exalts or depresses, kings or nations, as he pleases. (Notes, 1 Sam. ii. 3—8.) All the power and policy of earth and hell, cannot conceal any thing from him, or carry one point against him. All creatures subserve his purposes, and assist in accomplishing his vast designs. But those who break his commandments, and,

CHAP. XIII.

Job, confident of his knowledge, appeals to God; disdainfully and peevishly reproves his friends, for pleading against him, with false reasonings and partiality; and warns them to fear the judgment of God, 1—12. In extreme suffering, and expecting death, he professes confidence that God would justify him, 13—19. He craves respite, and desires to know his sins, and why God dealt so rigorously with him, 20—28.

depending on their power, wisdom, or dignity, exalt themselves against his cause, and rebel against his authority, after having been constrained to subserve his plan, shall be cast off with indignation, and rendered contemptible and miserable: while such as submit to his authority, and trust in his mercy, obey his precepts, and aim to promote his cause and honour in the world, shall be taken care of by the way, and at the end shall be graciously received with, “Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into “the joy of thy Lord.” May this be our choice, our conduct, and our felicity!

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1, 2. With manifest self-preference, Job here declared, that the discoveries of God’s providential dealings with men, which he had stated, were the result of his own exact and careful observation; and that he understood these matters at least as well as his friends did, and therefore he did not want their instructions. (Note, xii. 2, 3.)

V. 3—6. An improper boldness is discernible in the discourses of Job, for which Elihu afterward justly reproved him: (Notes, xxxiii. 8—13. xxxiv. 5—9:) yet he did not mean to justify himself before God, but only to obtain from him a verdict in his favour against his friends, who treated him as a hypocrite; accusing him of crimes which he had never committed, and arguing from false principles, respecting the divine government of the world. They visited him indeed as physicians, in his distress; but by their improper treatment they irritated his disease. They would therefore do him the greatest favour in their power, and most shew their own wisdom, if they would hold their peace; and attend to his reasonings, from which they might learn to correct their own errors.

6 Hear ^k now my reasoning, and hearken to the pleadings of my lips.

7 Will ye ^l speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him?

8 Will ye ^m accept his person? will ye contend for God?

9 Is it good that he should ⁿ search you out? or ^o as one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him?

13 ^v Hold your peace, ^w let me alone, that I may speak, ^x and let come on me what will.

14 Wherefore do ^y I take my flesh in my teeth, ^z and put my life in mine hand?

V. 7—12. The disputants meant to vindicate the Lord’s dealings with Job, and to plead his cause: but they bore false witness against their friend, and used deceitful reasonings in the argument. Now, if such practices were admitted, in pleading for a king against one of his subjects; it would be called “accepting his person,” and be a reproach to the character of the king, and a disgrace to the cause. But God wanted not such advocates, nor did his conduct need vindicating by such means. Job therefore reminded his friends, that when their conduct should be searched out, it would appear very wicked, and dishonourable to God; and that he would certainly rebuke them for condemning the innocent. If indeed they duly considered the majesty and excellency of God, they would be afraid of his indignation, while under pretence of pleading his cause, they acted so contrary to his example: and it would better become them to consider themselves as sinful dying creatures, whose bodies would speedily return to the earth, and whose remembrance would be buried in obscurity or oblivion.—Bishop Patrick thus paraphrases the concluding verse, perhaps according to the true meaning of the original: ‘Whose remonstrances on his behalf are no better than dust; and the arguments you accumulate, but like ‘so many heaps of dirt.’

V. 13, 14. Perhaps Job’s friends seemed about to interrupt him; or shewed apprehensions, that divine judgment would come upon him for so pertinaciously attesting his innocence. ‘Well,’ says he, ‘keep silence, let me speak, and I will risk all consequences; for my anguish is so excessive that I could even gnaw my own flesh: and, as I am not conscious of any great crime for which I am thus punished, I would even venture my life to have this matter cleared up.’ (Notes, vi. 8—13. vii. 7—11.)

V. 15—19. The first clause in this passage may be properly rendered as an interrogation, “Lo, he will slay me, shall not I trust?” or, “though he should slay me, shall not I trust?” Our version is formed from a change in the text, on the authority of the Jewish writers, which in this case seems not at all necessary.—Even if left to die of his diseases, or to be cut off by a sudden stroke, Job determined not to give up his confidence.—His friends had intimated, that the return of his prosperity would evince his former integrity, and his present repentance: (Notes, v. 18—27. viii. 20—22. xi. 13—20;) but he, conscious that he had walked uprightly before God, and having an assured belief of his faithfulness and mercy, would confide in him as his Salvation, even though he slew him; and would maintain before him, that he had not been a wicked dissembler, though he well knew that no hypocrite could escape detection, or condemnation in his sight. He desired his friends to attend to his appeal, and to observe how he ordered his cause: he did not deny that he was a sinner; but he pleaded that he was not a hypocrite. From the charge of hypocrisy he knew that God would justify him; and he challenged them to bring forward the proofs of their allegations. He had lost all, except his character, the testimony of his conscience, and his hope in God, which they endeavoured to rend from him; and it would be death to him, not to vindicate himself from their cruel aspersions.—“For now, I shall be silent, and expire.”

V. 20—23. Job here addressed himself to God, and begged of him to try his cause. Provided his outward pains, and his inward horror, were removed, so that the divine majesty did not overwhelm him, he was confident he could plead effectually in his own behalf; and he would either propose, or answer, questions relative to his case, as the Lord pleased. In the first instance he desired to know, “how many his iniquities” were; and especially he wished to discover what that transgression was, which had brought his present calamities upon him. It is probable that Job intended this merely as an appeal to God, that it was not hypocrisy, or gross oppression; yet the address was querulous and passionate, and when the Lord actually spake, Job found he could not answer him. (Notes, xl. 1—5. xlii. 1—6.)—“O God, I cannot accuse myself of wilful wickedness against thee: but if there be any secret iniquity that I am not privy to, do thou make it known to me, and convince me of it.” Bp. Hall.—Note, x. 1, 2. Ps. cxxxix. 23, 24.)

V. 24—28. As the Lord neither removed Job’s pains, nor vindicated his character, nor comforted his soul, he considered him as hiding his face in anger, and holding him as an enemy. And he pleaded, that this was beneath the infinite Majesty of Heaven; seeing he was so mean and frail, and at the point of death, as a withered leaf or dry stubble, the sport of the winds and fuel for the flame. (Note, vii. 17—19.) He thought that God framed more severe decrees against him, and inflicted on him more bitter things, than on any one else: and, as he was conscious, that during his maturer years, he had uprightly served the Lord; he supposed that his youthful iniquities, previous to his conversion, were now remembered against him, and that he possessed them in their painful effects. For it was evident, that divine judgments confined him, as a prisoner in the stocks, till his conduct had been examined, and evidence against him sought after: and that the prints of God’s displeasure were marked upon his whole body, even to the soles of his feet; (ii. 7;) insomuch that he was consuming, as a putrefying carcase, and wearing away, as a moth-eaten garment. (Notes, ii. 7, 8. xxx. 15—31. Num. xii. 11—13.)—In these complaints we discern the effects of strong temptations, and remaining depravity: yet in this chapter Job expresses a regard to God in every thing; shews lively exercises of faith, hope, and confidence in him; and gives many evidences of a sound judgment and a tender conscience.

CHAP. XIV.

Job pleads with God for relief, because of the shortness and misery of life, and the sinfulness of human nature, 1—6. Viewing death as destructive to all

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

It is very difficult for man to possess superior talents, without some appearance of ostentation and self-preference: yet to be "clothed with humility" confers a peculiar gracefulness upon wisdom, knowledge, and every shining quality.—In troubles of mind and conscience, we frequently find men to be "physicians of no value." They often either mistake our case, or attribute our distress to a wrong cause, or prescribe pernicious remedies, and by one means or other increase our malady. But when the conscience is wounded, and the heart dismayed with the fear of wrath, the prevalence of sin, the force of temptation, or the weight of affliction, we should apply to the Physician of our souls; whose knowledge, power, and love are infinite, who never rejects any sincere application, and who never leaves any case uncured. To him we may speak, and before him we may spread our case, at all times; which is a peculiar comfort when we meet with harsh treatment from man: and, though we are sinners, and have committed numberless offences; yet, "if our heart condemn us" not of hypocrisy, we may have humble confidence before him. (Note, 1 John iii. 18—24.)—Sometimes the greatest comfort that we can afford the afflicted, consists in patiently attending to their complaints: and when we do not understand the subject in debate, or see that others know more of it than we do, or are eager to be heard; it is our wisdom altogether to hold our peace, in hopes to get some good, when we cannot do any.—Deceit and iniquity are doubly base, when employed in the professed cause of truth and piety; because they seem to imply, that religion needs to be supported by such disgraceful means. But the God of truth and love can never approve the conduct of those who slander, deceive, or persecute their brethren, under pretence of doing him service. Such conduct, when searched into, appears an impious mockery of God; and springs from the basest motives, however secret they are kept. He will therefore surely reprove the offenders: and a due attention to the holy excellency of his character would fill with terror of his vengeance, all those who ignorantly hope for his favour in any unhallowed attempts to serve him.

V. 13—28.

In this evil world, considering how frail we are, and how short our time is, we may find enough to employ us, without falsely accusing and reviling our brethren.—Under every affliction we should aim to keep up a confidence in the divine mercy, which will preserve us under the most exquisite agonies, from doing ourselves any harm.—Though outward evils and inward distresses should unite in our case, and continue unabated till death; a strong and active faith, an acquaintance with the scriptural ground of a believer's hope, and conscious integrity, may enable the poor earthly hopes, he yet desires to be hid in the grave, and determines to wait the time appointed for his change, 7—15. He complains that God dealt severely with him; and shews that all things on earth, and men especially, are subject to corruption, 16—22.

tempted soul to trust in the Lord, and to expect salvation from him. The upright may maintain his cause before him, and be assured that he will be justified; but no hypocrite can come with acceptance before him, or find admission into his kingdom. Yet it is best to repress our vehement passions, and to wait his time of clearing our aspersed characters; though to sit down under some slanders, without attempting our own vindication, be almost as the pangs of death to us: and indeed it is very cruel to bereave an afflicted man of his reputation, or to endeavour to discourage his hope in God, without any evidence of his guilt.—It is very desirable to have a clear conscience and an assurance of God's favour: yet great humility and reverence becomes us in appealing unto him. He knows us better than we do ourselves; and we should humbly beseech him to bring us acquainted with our sins, that we may repent and seek forgiveness. But he, who duly considers the number and heinousness of his transgressions, will not wonder that God hides his face and afflicts him; nor would he have cause to complain of injustice, if he treated him as an enemy. And, though we are mean, as the dry leaf or the stubble; yet, being also guilty and polluted, and proper fuel for the fire of the Lord's indignation, it would not be dishonourable to him, if he were to pursue us to destruction. Sins long since forgotten by us, stand recorded in his book; the guilt of which no time can obliterate: while old age often possesses the iniquities of youth, by bodily diseases, ruined circumstances, bad habits, a guilty conscience, or rebellious children: and it is a mercy, if final condemnation be escaped.—Should God observe our steps, and narrowly examine our paths, we could in no wise stand before him in judgment: he would indeed "write bitter things against us;" and both body and soul would eternally be filled with the marks of his righteous vengeance. This will be the awful case of unbelievers: yet there is salvation, provided and revealed, not from temporal sorrows, (for our bodies must still return to the dust, and perish as a garment that is moth-eaten,) but "from the wrath to come." For when the mortal body of the believer, whose sins are washed away in the blood of Christ, shall be laid in the grave, his soul will find admission into the realms of glory, and his body also shall at length arise incorruptible and immortal. Seeking first this eternal salvation, let us bear our present trials without a murmur; let us often humble ourselves anew for sins long since committed and repented of, and look forward to death as the period of all our sorrows. And let young persons beware of indulging themselves in sin; for even in this world they may so possess the iniquities of their youth, as to have months of sorrow for moments of pleasure. (Note, John v. 10—14. P. O. 1—14, conclusion.) Their wisdom and duty therefore consist in remembering their Creator in their early days, that they may have assured hope and sweet peace of conscience, as the solace of their declining years. NOTES

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—6. Job, perhaps perceiving that his friends disregarded him, continued his discourse, by descanting upon the condition of man, and interspersing addresses unto God. He observed, that every man, born of Adam's race, is short-lived and exposed to manifold afflictions: all his beauty, felicity, splendour, and gaiety, fall before the stroke of sickness or of death, as the gaudy flower before the scythe; or they pass away like the fleeting shadow. (Notes, Ps. xc. 3—6. xcii. 6, 7. 12. ciii. 15—18. Is. xl. 6—8. Jam. i. 9—11. 1 Pet. i. 23—25.) He then expostulated with God, for noticing, or judging with such severity, a poor creature beneath his regard. (Notes, vii. 17—19. xiii. 24—28.) He was indeed a sinner, being descended from sinful parents, as all other men were: even as, in the whole course of nature, the progeny partake of the propensities and qualities of the creature, from which it sprang. For "who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one." Or, how could it be possible for his conduct to be sinless, when his heart was by nature polluted and unclean? In either sense, this forms a decisive testimony, that Job understood and believed the doctrine of original sin: and though he did not apply it, in so humble and pious a manner, as David afterwards did; (Note, Ps. li. 5, 6;) yet he seems to have intended it as a plea, why the Lord should not deal with him according to his own works, but according to his promised mercy and grace.—Job proceeded to observe, that man's days were determined, and he could not exceed his appointed term of life; therefore he prayed that he might have a little rest from his exquisite anguish, till the wearisome work of life was over, and death should end his sorrows; which would be as welcome to him as night to the fatigued and worn-down day-labourer.

V. 7—12. Though a tree be cut down, and the stump seem decayed in the earth; yet, if it be in a moist and fruitful situation, it may be expected that tender branches will shoot forth, and grow up as a newly planted tree, or as if the old tree again revived. But when a man is cut off by death, he is for ever removed from his place in this world; no one expects to see him again; and his body returns to the earth whence it was taken, and mingles with it; even as the waters return to the sea, whence they first came. Thus he lieth down, till the consummation of all things, when he shall awake at the general resurrection.—All these expressions imply Job's belief of that great doctrine; though both ancient and modern Sadducees have contrived to misunderstand him. Why else should he speak of death as "sleep," and mention a period to it when he shall awake, even "when the heavens are no more?" (Marg. Ref. u—x.)—Either Job meant by these considerations to comfort himself with the hope of having soon and for ever done with this wretched world; or he used them as a plea, why God should grant him respite from trouble to prepare for death, the consequences of which are irreversible.

V. 13—15. Job here earnestly prayed, that God would speedily terminate his sorrows, and hide him in the grave, till his fatherly displeasure were past, or the present storm subsided: that he would set a time when he would release him; or at present dismiss him, till the appointed period of the resurrection, and the general judgment, and then remember him in mercy. As, however, death would soon remove him hence, he determined to wait, in patience and hope, “all the days of his appointed time,” till that change should take place; and to look forward in believing expectation to the resurrection, when God would call him forth out of the grave, and he would gladly answer; when he would come to try his cause and justify him, and take delight in the work of his hands.—The change, or renovation, which shall take place, at the resurrection, seems principally intended. (Note, Phil. iii. 20, 21.)

Wait till, &c. (14) Ὑπομενῶ ἕως πάλιν γενῶμαι. “I will wait, till I shall exist again.” Sept.

V. 16—22. In the preceding verses Job spoke in some degree of faith and hope; but here despondency again prevails. He represents God as strictly scrutinizing his whole conduct; and collecting evidence against him, which he preserved as a treasure sealed or sewed up in a bag, that he might be punished with the utmost rigour. (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 34, 35. Rom. ii. 4—6.) He would not say that God did him injustice; but he thought that he carried matters to extremity against him: and in that case he would certainly bring him to destruction without remedy. For his indignation must ruin the happiness, and the hope, of the most prosperous and powerful; as an earthquake subverts the strongest mountains, or removes the solid rocks: or, if more gradually, yet effectually, as the waters wear away the stones, or wash away the earth and its productions from the high to the low grounds. Indeed, God irresistibly prevails against all who contend with him; by sickness or death he changes their countenances, and sends them away into misery: and when the body is full of pain, or the soul of terror at the approach of death, the poor sufferer cannot notice either the prosperity or the adversity of his family.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

It is very useful, seriously to reflect on the shortness and uncertainty of human life; on the vanity and vexation of all human enjoyments; and on the fading nature of all worldly splendour, which has neither substance nor continuance: that we may cease to expect happiness from earthly objects, and learn to “lay up our treasure in heaven.” But it is still more interesting to advert properly to the cause and the remedy of these evils. “By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so and thou ^m destroyest the hope of man.

ⁿ Ec viii. 8. 20 Thou ⁿ prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth: thou ^o changest his countenance, and sendest him away.

^p 1 Sam. iv. 20. Ps. xxxix. 6. Ec. ii. 18, 19. ix. 5. Is xxxix. 7, 8. lxiii. 16. 21 His sons come to honour, and ^p he knoweth it not; and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them.

^q xix. 20. 22. 26. xxxiii. 19—21. 22 But ^q his flesh upon him shall have pain, and ^r his soul within him shall mourn.

“death passed upon all men.” We receive our nature through this corrupted channel, and all the powers of our soul are contaminated by it: for who can produce a holy offspring from an unholy stock? The almighty power of God, indeed, once formed the holy human nature of the Saviour, in the womb of a sinful woman; but that was above, and contrary to, the established order of nature, that he might appear “in the likeness of sinful flesh,” and yet be without sin. All else are conceived, and shapen in iniquity; and we all early manifest an aversion to God and his holy service, and our actual transgressions soon become numerous. So that unless we be “born of the Spirit,” no spiritually good thing dwells in us or can proceed from us: and even the little good of the regenerate is greatly defiled. We should therefore learn to abase ourselves before God, as abominable and polluted creatures: we should cease from all dependence on our own works; deprecate the strictness and severity of the divine judgment; and cast ourselves wholly on the mercy of our God, according to the new covenant of grace, through the mediation of our divine Surety: and we should daily seek the renewing of the Holy Spirit, and look forward to heaven as the only place of perfect holiness and felicity.—As the number of our days and months is appointed, which we cannot exceed; we should both seize the present moment, and pray for the preservation of our faculties, and the composure of our minds, that we may prepare for eternity, and finish our measure of trials and services with comfort and acceptance; relying on the tender compassion of our heavenly Father, who remembereth that we are but dust. A span of life alone remains unto us; our duties are exceedingly important, in their consequences to ourselves and to others: and if the opportunity be slipped, it will be irrecoverable for ever. Whatever then we find to do, let us do it heartily and immediately. (Note, Ec. ix. 10.) If our trials be heavy and many, they will not here last long; death will finally terminate all our earthly sorrows and comforts: yet even that is but a sleep; the soul will continue to live and act; and the body will awake and live, when “the heavens shall be no more.” (Notes, Dan. xii. 2, 3. 1 Thes. iv. 13—18.) If our sins be forgiven, and our hearts renewed unto holiness, heaven will be the rest of our souls, while our bodies will be secretly hid in the grave from the malice of our enemies, and we shall then feel no more pain from the corrections of our God. At the appointed time, he will again remember us; and then we shall find every cloud dispersed, and every frown removed. Then the Lord will call his sleeping saints, and they will answer him; they will arise incorruptible and glorious; they will be publicly justified, and manifested to be his children and heirs; he will shew his love to them and his delight in them, as the creatures of his power, and the subjects of his grace; and death shall be “swallowed up in victory.” A few more days of conflict and difficulty, and this change shall begin in death; when the soul, released from sin and sorrow, and perfected in holiness, will joyfully wait for the re-union of the body, and that last, complete, and eternal change, when “mortality shall be swallowed up of life.” For this appointed period let us wait with godly fear, with realizing faith and cheerful hope, with diligent preparation and patient continuance in well-doing; neither desirous of living, nor impatient of the troubles of life.

We should on no account yield to the suggestions of Satan, or the dictates of unbelief, to conclude, that the Lord can deal even in rigorous justice with a sinner, who has a hope of everlasting life; or that he intends the misery and condemnation of those who trust in his mercy, and who desire to know and do his will.—We ought to number our own steps, watch over our sins, and keep an exact account of our transgressions, that we may humbly seek forgiveness of them, and more highly value the salvation of the gospel: and if we thus “judge ourselves, we shall not “be condemned of the Lord.” He may afflict us with salutary chastisements; disease may fill our flesh with pain, change our countenance, and wear us away; we may lose the comfort of our families and connexions, and every hope of earthly felicity: but our God will not send the believer away into the regions of darkness and despair; nay, he will receive him into the realms of eternal felicity.—But what a change awaits the prosperous unbeliever! When the appointed period arrives, a state of unmixed, unalterable, and eternal misery will succeed! How will he answer, when God shall call him to his tribunal? Then indeed will he find, though now he will not believe it, that God numbered all his steps, and watched over his sins, and kept an exact account of all his iniquities, which are sealed up as evidence to be produced against him at the day of trial. And if the light afflictions that are but for a moment, and which God's own children suffer here, be so wearying and distressing, what will the vengeance be that he reserves for his determined enemies! The strength of mountains and rocks cannot “stand before his indignation,” or shelter sinners from it. Their hope will then be destroyed for ever. Where will then be their possessions, pleasures, and distinctions? All past away and come to nought! Their countenance will then change, when the Judge shall bid them “depart accursed into “everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels:” and when body and soul are thus filled with anguish, what comfort can they derive from the consideration, that their crimes immortalized their names, and aggrandized their families, and that their estates descended to their posterity?—But the Lord is yet upon a mercy-seat, ready to be gracious: “Oh, that men were wise, that “they understood these things, that they would consider “their latter end!”

CHAP. XV. V. 1—13. Instead of being convinced by Job's reasoning, or softened by his pathetick complaints, Eliphaz, with increasing severity, led on a second attack against him. Job had been reputed a wise man: but Eliphaz asked, whether it consisted with that character, to propagate notions so empty, and to satisfy his conscience with them; when they were as unfit for the purpose, as the unwholesome east wind would be to appease his hunger. Would any wise man reason with such inconclusive arguments?—Thus contemptuously did he speak concerning Job's discourse. Yet in fact his doctrine was true, his cause was good, and many of his observations very wise and pious.—Eliphaz next charged him with casting off the fear of God, and restraining prayer before him: either because he concluded from some hasty expressions, that Job had no reverence for God, and proudly refused to call upon him in his trouble; or, that his doctrine would embolden others to ungodliness with the hopes of impunity, or discourage them from prayer by representing religion as unprofitable. “Truly thou makest void fear” (that is, the fear of God); and diminishest meditation (or, worship) “before him.”—He further accused him with choosing craftily to cloke his iniquity with the semblance of piety; observing that there needed nothing more than his own words to convict and condemn him.—He next enquired, whether he were the first of men, or had existed before the creation; whether he were of the secret council of God, or had engrossed all wisdom to himself. If not, why did he presume to know more than any of his friends; when they were themselves, or had on their side, much older men than he, or even than his father. And he demanded, “whether the consolations of God were “small with him:” that is, whether the consolations, which they proposed to him, if penitent, were so small, that he should contemn them as “physicians of no value.” Or, whether he had any better method of comfort and deliverance, which he kept secret from them. In short, Eliphaz expostulated with Job, for letting his own heart carry him into such arrogant behaviour to them, and into so daring impiety against God, as he had just uttered.—Temptation and anguish indeed had extorted several improper expressions from Job: but Eliphaz was evidently angry, because he did not confess himself a hypocrite; but argued against the decision of him and his friends, and treated their discourses with peevish neglect, as either false, or inapplicable to the case.

V. 14—16. (Notes, iv. 17—21. ix. 1—3. 14—21. xiv. 1—6.) The holy God puts no trust in his saints, his holy ones, or holy angels: nay, he sees defect and mutability in the heavens themselves; as well as in its inhabitants, some of whom kept not their first estate. How “abominable “then and filthy” in his sight is man, even every one who is born of woman! For it is evident, that he naturally craves sinful indulgences with a greedy appetite, and seeks his satisfaction in them, as one who is thirsty desires and drinks down water with greediness and delight: and that he quenches his perverse thirst as often as it returns, even by the commission of the most atrocious crimes.—This text forms a conclusive proof, that these disputants were deeply convinced of the doctrine of original sin, and the total depravity of human nature, as far as man is left to his own innate propensities. But that doctrine could not fairly be made to bear on the point at issue; because Job did not attempt to justify himself from the charge of sinfulness, but merely from that of hypocrisy, or gross wickedness.

V. 17—35. Eliphaz here again laboured to confirm his position, that the righteous prosper, and the wicked are miserable, in this world. He stated, that this was not merely his own opinion, but a tradition received from their fathers: and one which wise men had always approved and taught; and they especially, whose exclusive authority and prosperity were the reward of their singular piety. It was their uniform observation, that wicked men passed through life in pain, and in constant dread of death: that if they prospered for a little time, some spoiler or murderer soon came upon them: that when they began to be distressed, they were driven to despair; and that in general they were speedily reduced to want and beggary; and had their trouble and anguish embittered by the dread of impending vengeance, which would prevail against them as a victorious potentate. He did not mean that this was the case of every transgressor; but of the presumptuous rebel, who opposed the authority of God, arraigned his providence, and hardened his heart in defiance of his wrath; who was rendered insolent and secure by prosperity; and who became outrageous in adversity, as if he would run upon the Almighty like a desperate warrior, who rushes upon certain death, that he may attempt revenge upon his enemy. He meant the man, whose impiety was connected with rapine and oppression; by whom whole cities had been desolated, and then occupied. The ill-gotten wealth of such a person would never continue, nor the perfection of his prosperity be prolonged. The wrath of God, like a consuming fire, would destroy him root and branch; or, like a tempestuous wind, would drive him away into darkness and despair. Let not then any one, who had gloried in such false confidences, continue to deceive himself; since disappointment and vexation would be his recompence, and his prosperity, and offspring, would come to an untimely end. For hypocrites, however numerous, would be exposed and ruined; and unjust judges, who had amassed riches by bribery, would be consumed. They had conceived mischief and contrived deceit and fraud; and they would find themselves deceived and cheated, with the shadow of happiness and the reality of misery.—Many important truths were contained in this discourse: but, as far as it related to temporal prosperity or adversity, it admitted of numerous exceptions; and it implied an invidious application to the case of Job. It was evidently intimated, that he was the prosperous sinner, the presumptuous offender, the desperate rebel against God, the oppressor, the hypocrite, the corrupt judge: the ruin of his substance and family, with his inward terror and anguish, were so many demonstrations of his guilt; and his vindication of himself completed the evidence, and almost constituted him a blasphemer, as if he charged the Lord with injustice, and set himself in array against him.—Thus Eliphaz inadvertently took the part of Satan; and brought in a verdict against Job, as if he had actually and openly cursed God. (Notes, i. 9—11. iv. 1.) declamation, than of reasoning with cogency and temper.—“The wisdom which is from above,” teaches us to consider the tendency and effect of our knowledge, and renders us careful not to satisfy ourselves, or amuse others, with unprofitable notions, empty words, or delusive arguments. Every investigation of divine truth should be conducted in the fear of God, and with fervent prayer: and whatever encourages men in sin, or discourages their approach to the mercy-seat of God, must be false and pernicious. Yet prejudiced and angry disputers frequently charge consequences upon their opponents, which are not fairly deducible from their tenets; and accuse them of those crimes which they abhor.—Men’s own mouths often proclaim their iniquity; and even betray the secret hypocrisy of their hearts: yet they, who are forward to make others “offenders for a word,” are commonly found most guilty, and in judging others condemn themselves; and we should carefully distinguish between the language of infirmity and temptation, and that of deliberate impiety. It is common, for men to exclaim against the pride of others, when their own pride most manifestly prevails: and this is evidently the case, when they grow angry on being contradicted; and charge those, who dissent from them, with arrogance, with pretending to be wiser than all mankind, or engrossing all knowledge to themselves; and when they would decide controversies by authority, and by their own superior age and experience. We should watch and pray against this indecent and self-sufficient spirit; and that we may not misrepresent men’s words, nor accuse them without evidence.—In the worst estate of man on earth, he has many unmerited comforts from God. No consolations can be had in trouble, but in the way of faith and prayer; no other secret can be found to heal a wounded conscience, and a broken heart, than the encouragements of the gospel; and however proposed, they are worthy of our acceptance. Yet unmerited reproach and unseasonable severity may so embitter a man’s spirit, that he cannot receive them from those, who have thus discomposed him.—But, alas! “what is man, that he should be clean,” or righteous! Indeed, pious men in every age, and nation, who have differed and engaged in controversy in other things, have unanimously agreed, that our fallen nature is abominable and polluted, delighting in iniquity, and drinking it down with greediness. We may well then admire the patience of God in bearing with us; and still more his love to us, in “the redemption which is in Jesus Christ,” and the mercy and grace through him vouchsafed to all who believe.

CHAP. XVI.

Job reproves his friends, for their conduct towards him ; and shews how he would have acted, if they had been afflicted as he was, 1—5. He pathetically describes his heavy and varied sorrows, 6—16. As a dying man, he appeals to God to attest his integrity, Jam. i. 19. 17—22.

THEN Job answered and said,
2 I have ^a heard many such things :
* miserable comforters are ye all.
3 Shall [†] vain words have an end ?
or ^b what emboldeneth thee that thou answerest ?
4 I also could speak as ye do ; ^c if your soul were in my soul's stead, I could heap ^d up words against you, and ^e shake mine head at you.

V. 17—35.

We should not despise the wisdom and experience of pious persons in former ages, or the result of their observation : but neither authority, reputation, antiquity, nor greatness, renders men infallible.—The word of God evinces, that sinners are and will be miserable, in proportion to their crimes, unless they repent and obtain forgiveness. Yet the most wicked may sometimes live long in outward prosperity, and die without any remarkable catastrophe : (Notes, Ps. lxxiii. 4—9 :) but the vexations of the world, and the thoughts of death and judgment, must fill them with pain and terror. Sometimes they are cut off by premature death, reduced to unexpected poverty, or beset with dangers on every side ; or their departure is attended with horror and anguish. Commonly a curse corrodes their ill-gotten treasures, and their families speedily decay and sink into obscurity : at all times, the wrath of God, as a consuming fire, is ready to fasten upon the dying sinner, and as a tempestuous wind to hurry him into the regions of darkness and despair. This must be the case of all, who live and die forgetful of God, and neglecting his salvation : but what will be the doom of those daring rebels, who strengthen themselves in direct opposition to his known will, his cause, and glory ; and who prosecute their covetous, sensual, ambitious, or revengeful purposes, in contempt of his authority, and defiance of his vengeance ; who grow insolent in prosperity, and desperate in adversity ; and whose blasphemous impiety is connected with the most cruel oppression ! Were it not notorious, it could scarcely have been conceived, that men could be so infatuated in their enmity against God. But “ can their hands be strong, or their hearts endure,” when he shall call them to his judgment-seat ?—On the other hand the righteous may be destitute, afflicted, and tormented, even until death : yet they shall be supported, comforted, and delivered ; and the perfection of their felicity shall be prolonged for ever. Let none then deceive themselves and trust in vanity : as a man sows so shall he also reap ; and the whole company of the wicked, however numerous and distinguished, notwithstanding all their power and sagacity, shall perish for ever. But let us apply these truths to our own hearts and consciences, examine our own state and character by them, and cease uncandidly to judge and condemn our brethren.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1—3. Job here reproved Eliphaz, for repeating what was in itself uninteresting and inapplicable : and he decided that all his friends had proved themselves comforters, who increased, instead of diminishing his distress ; for they had reproached him without ceasing, instead of giving him any suitable encouragement. He was surprised, that they would proceed with such empty discourse : and that Eliphaz should have the courage, or rather harshness, to reply, after he and his associates had been so completely refuted.—If we consider the speech of Eliphaz abstractedly, Job undervalued it : but as it related to the matter in debate, he must be allowed to have had some reason for what he said.
V. 4, 5. A very pathetick turn is here given to the discourse. Had Job been in health, at ease, and prosperous, and his friends sick, bereaved, destitute, and tempted, he could have despised and reviled them very readily : but how would they have taken it ? He would, however, have scorned to behave in such a manner : on the contrary, he would have suggested topicks of consolation to strengthen their faith and patience, and to assuage their grief, with the encouraging hope of a happy event to their afflictions. (Note, iv. 3—6.)
V. 6—16. These verses contain most grievous complaints, and many harsh expressions, which may easily be accounted for, but cannot be justified.—Job began by observing that he could obtain no relief, either by silence or by speaking ; as all he said was misrepresented, and exposed him to further reproach. He declared that He, God himself, “ had made him weary,” even of his life : and then, turning his discourse to him, he further complained, that he had destroyed his family, dispersed all his companions, and left his friends so to mistake his case, that they had become his tormentors. He had likewise disfigured and wasted his body with dire diseases, so that his wrinkles and leanness were witnesses against him. Job next spoke of “ his enemy, who hated him, tare him, and gnashed “upon him” with insulting rage, and looked upon him as about to devour him. But it is not certain, whether he intended this of the severity, with which Eliphaz had treated him; or whether he meant Satan, who doubtless assaulted him with every horrid and terrifying temptation to drive him to despair; or whether he thus spoke of God, as become his enemy. (Marg. Ref. m—o.) He however meant his friends, when he spoke of those, who “gaped upon him with their mouth, smote him on the cheek reproachfully, and gathered themselves together against him;” (or, “filled themselves against him,” that is, fully gratified their ill-will;) referring to their unanimous accusations, by which they wounded his spirit, and exposed his character to disgrace.—He then complained that God had delivered him into the hands of wicked men: the Sabeans and Chaldeans had seized his substance; and his friends persecuted him, as if they had been ungodly men; nor could he obtain the least redress. Nay, the Lord himself brake him asunder, seizing upon him, and shaking him; as a strong man, when greatly enraged, would seize and shake one that was feeble and helpless: he had set him up as a mark, at which all the executioners of his vengeance were required to shoot their arrows; so that he was wounded in his vitals, and broken with renewed afflictions; and the Almighty seemed to run upon him with irresistible force and fury, as a giant or a mighty warrior upon one who dared not to oppose him. He had therefore assumed the garb of a mourner and a penitent; and the sackcloth, which he had put on, stuck to him as if sewed to his skin: his honour and authority were turned into deep disgrace; he was disfigured with incessant weeping; and death seemed ready to close his eyes. (Notes, i. 16—22. ii. 7—13. vi. 1—4. x. 14—17. xiii. 24—28.)

V. 17—22. It should be recollected, that Job did not mean to deny he was a sinner; but he solemnly protested that he had not been an unjust oppressor, or a hypocrite: and if he had shed any innocent blood, he called upon the earth no longer to cover it, but to disclose it, that he might be openly convicted. In that case he allowed, that he should have no right to compassion from man, or to expect that God would regard his cry for deliverance. But he was assured that He, who dwelleth in the heavens, knew his innocency, and would be a witness in his behalf. His friends, indeed, “despised him,” but he prayed with weeping before a merciful God: and he wished greatly that he could have access to him; and have his cause pleaded before him, as one pleadeth for another before the tribunal of earthly princes; that he might have his injured character vindicated, before the appointed years of his life were ended, which had been but few, and were now, as he thought, very soon to be closed.

And the plural is translated ambassadors; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 31: and interpreters; Is. xliii. 27. marg.: and it occurs nowhere else, except in this place. Hence many think it may signify a mediator.—Thus the passage may be rendered, “My Mediator is my Friend; my eye poureth out tears unto God. And one is pleading for man to God; “and the Son of man for his neighbour.” By a trivial change of the vowel points, the singular number may be admitted; and thus the sentiment expressed may be considered as an additional proof of Job’s faith in a Redeemer. (Notes, xix. 23—27. xxxiii. 19—26.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are all very incompetent judges of our own performances; and often suppose, that we have spoken things pertinent and excellent, when others deem them trite and inapplicable, and wonder that we should dwell on topicks not worth hearing, or be emboldened to speak at all. In fact, while the speaker is partial, the hearer is often prejudiced; and both parties should watch over themselves, if they would amicably settle controversies, profitably conduct conversation, or even preach and hear the word of God in a becoming manner.—We are not suitably affected with the sufferings of others, because we “do not love our neighbour as ourselves.” It is natural to those who are at ease, to give sage advice, grave reproofs, or solemn warnings to the afflicted; and even to censure and condemn them: but we ought to consider how we should feel, if thus treated in similar circumstances. Indeed, the prosperous are commonly troublesome comforters of the afflicted; sympathy and tenderness of spirit are seldom learned, except in the school of tribulation; and the experienced believer, who can make allowances for the anguish of disease, and the force of temptation, and recollects what topicks have proved consolatory to himself, best “knows how to speak a word in season to the weary,” which may strengthen his faith and hope, and assuage his grief.—In great distress, when we can get no relief, we are apt to yield to repining: and, as the believer may then be tempted even to think hardly of God’s dealings with him; he may well be borne with, if he speak peevishly and harshly of his fellow-creatures.—The consideration of the variety of complicated miseries that a godly man may endure, from the frown and correction of God, the rage and malice of Satan, and the ingratitude and cruelty of men, in his conscience, reputation, connexions, soul and body, should teach us to prepare for trials, and excite our gratitude for our many mercies; while it should warn the sinner to “flee from the wrath to come.”—How weary and desolate will the wicked be in the eternal world! How will the rage of Satan, the company of the damned, mutual enmity and contempt, and the irreconcilable wrath of God, unite with the reproaches of conscience, and the horrors of despair, to fill them with inexpressible misery! There they will be the mark of all the arrows of divine vengeance, and incessant weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth, will be their dreadful employment!—But should not the same reflection lead the believer to Gethsemane and Golgotha? The divine Saviour had far more cause than Job, to complain that “he was made weary;” that all his company of followers was desolated; that his enemy who hated him was permitted to assault and tear him; that he was delivered into the hands of the ungodly, who gaped upon him, gathered themselves against him, reproached, insulted, smote, and crucified him; yea, that “it pleased the LORD to bruise him,” and inflict upon him agonies unknown; yet “not for any injustice in his hands:” also his prayer was pure.” He was “wounded for our transgressions,” and suffered for our sins, that he might deliver us from the wrath to come, and bestow on us the gift of eternal life. Should he not then be precious to our souls? and ought we not promptly to obey him, and suffer for his sake?—If our conscience be sprinkled with his atoning blood, and testify to our integrity; if “our witness be in heaven, and our record on high,” that we are not living in iniquity or hypocrisy;—though our afflictions abound, our enemies triumph, and our friends despise us; yet God will receive our prayer, and regard our tears, and in due time plead our cause, clear our characters, and assign a period to our trials. And when we “go the way whence we shall not return,” it will be a release from prison, and an entrance into unalloyed glory and felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1, 2. The nature and violence of Job’s disease rendered it painful to him, and offensive to others, when he drew his breath; and he concluded that his days were expiring, and that the sepulchres of his ancestors were ready for him. In these doleful circumstances he was surrounded with professed friends, who were indeed “mockers;” as they insulted over his misery, and despised instead of comforting him: nor could he turn his attention from their reproaches to view more encouraging objects, or think of any thing else during whole nights. (Marg.)

V. 3—7. Again Job intreated the Lord, to give him some assurance, that he would soon try his cause, or appoint some impartial judge, to whom he could confidently refer the decision; (Notes, xvi. 17—22. xxiii. 3—7. xxxiii. 1—7;) for his friends, being judicially infatuated, would never be honoured in such a service. He supposed that their former professions of affection for him were mere flattery; or that their doctrine flattered the prosperous, as if they were the favourites of Heaven: or, he assured them, that though he desired fair treatment from them, he did not wish them to flatter him; being sensible that God abhorred flattery, and that those who aimed to advance themselves by it, would heap up disappointment and misery for their children.—“I must speak the truth of them, (though it displeases them,) and not soothe them in their errors: for

‘he that flatters his friends, when he should reprove them,

—Indeed, God had so reduced and afflicted his servant,
that he was become a proverb and an object of derision, even to those, who before professed greatly to respect and delight in him. (Notes, xxix. 18—25. xxx. 1—14. Ez.
xxxiii. 30—33.)

V. 8, 9. Upright believers, in different parts and ages of the world, would hear how this conscientious servant of God had been afflicted, and how his friends had treated him; at which they would be greatly astonished. But this would excite them to distinguish themselves from hypocrites, and set themselves against them; especially against such as condemned others merely because they were afflicted. And when God should make known Job’s real character, and the reason of his extraordinary trials; his example would be an adjudged case, that no adversity could prove a man to be wicked, or an object of divine wrath. This would be a great encouragement to the righteous, to hold on their way, in the midst of difficulties, re-proaches, and suspicions; nay, to grow stronger in faith under those very trials, which detected and turned aside the hypocrite. Some explain the passage, as a wish, “Let the upright, &c.,” but in fact, these have been the effects of Job’s sufferings in numberless instances; and this was one grand design for which they were permitted.
“Ye have heard of the patience of Job; and have seen
“the end of the Lord, that the Lord is very pitiful and of “tender mercy.” (Jam. v. 11.)—Here a glimpse of divine light, and a lively exercise of faith and hope, broke forth in the midst of the despondency of Job’s discourse. (Notes, xix. 23—27. xxiii. 8—12.)

V. 10. Do ye return, &c. That is, ‘Re-examine my cause, and alter your unjust decision; for I cannot find one among you who has spoken on this subject, as a wise man would have done.’ (Notes, vi. 27—30. Mal. iii. 13—

V. 11, 12. The old translation seems here to be both more literal and intelligible. “My days are past, my enterprises are broken, and the thoughts of my heart have “changed the night for the day, and the light that ap“proached, for darkness.”—All the purposes which Job had formed, however wise, pious, or benevolent, were, as he supposed, finally come to nothing, as his days were cast. (Notes, Ps. cxlvi. 3, 4. Ec. ix. 10.) And now the thoughts which possessed his heart turned the night into day, by preventing his rest. Yet when the light approached, it was turned into darkness by the gloom of his disquieted mind.—‘My thoughts will not let me sleep in the night,

1—6. 13, 14.)

V. 13—16. Whenever Job thought of waiting, in hope of his sufferings being terminated, that thought was associated with the idea of lodging in the dark and silent grave.
His disease, and his daily reflections, familiarized his mind to corruption and the worms; and he was induced to claim kindred with them, through the present loathsomeness of his disease; and to expect more relief from them, than from his friends and nearest relations.—He had indeed no hopes of temporal good; nor would they, who flattered him with these expectations, ever witness such a change in his circumstances. All his hopes would soon descend with him into the grave; when he and his friends also would rest together in the dust. (Notes, vi. 8—13. 15—23. ix. 14—21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If constrained to dwell with mockers and revilers, we should endeavour to withdraw our attention from them, by meditating on the blessed society in heaven; that our tempers may not be ruffled by “continuing in their pro“vocation.”—Through our divine Surety, the believer shall not only be justified from his sins against God, but from all the false accusations of man.—To be so judicially blinded, that the Lord hides the heart from understanding, forms a most dreadful case, and forebodes everlasting shame and misery: but this never befalls those who humbly trust and serve him; nor should we rashly conclude it to be the case of any, merely because they mistake in some things, which appear to us of great importance.—The Lord abhors
the flattering of the prosperous, and the contemning of the afflicted: we should therefore study godly simplicity, and candid compassion.—Vain is the praise of men: they extol
a person one day, and insult him the next; they idolize and then execrate, perhaps without any other cause, than a change in a man’s outward circumstances. Let us then be indifferent about human applause, and “seek the honour “which cometh from God.”—As we, at this distance of time, may derive encouragement and instruction from the sufferings of Job, so may others from our lighter afflictions; and this may serve to reconcile us to them. Indeed, the upright believer will extract benefit from every event. The falls of those, who once seemed to run well, will teach him humble watchfulness and jealous fear; and stir him up to guard against hypocrisy, and protest against hypocrites: the afflictions of the godly will teach him the nature of his warfare, and warn him to prepare for the conflict: and the heaviest affliction which is laid upon him, will eventually tend to strengthen his faith, increase his patience, and encourage his hope, while he is walking in the ways of God and doing his work.—We should always be open to conviction, and ready to retract our erroneous sentiments and unmerited censures; for this is a good proof of wisdom.—The purposes and thoughts of our hearts are soon broken off, by sickness or the prospect of death; and they often break our sleep, and darken our days with solicitude to no purpose. Let us then learn to renounce carnal hopes and anxieties, to execute immediately every wise and useful design, and “to cast all our care upon him that careth for us.” Let us remember, how nearly our bodies are allied to corruption, the worm, and the dust; and seek for that lively hope which shall be accomplished, when the hope of the wicked will be put out in darkness; that, when our bodies are confined in the grave, our souls may enjoy “the rest reserved for the people of God.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 2—4. Bildad had before given Job good advice and encouragement; (Notes, viii. 4—7. 20—22;) but here he used nothing but rebukes, and presages of approaching ruin. He speaks, as if there were persons present, during the debate, some of whom favoured Job and took his part, when he says, “How long will it be ere ye make an end of words?” (Note, xxxv. 4—8.) He thought it long, before his own time came to speak; and he calls upon Job, and all who were of his sentiments, to mark with attention, that they might understand, what was spoken by him and his friends.—It must be allowed, that Job had spoken contemptuously enough concerning the discourses of his friends, declaring that “God had hid their hearts from understanding,” and that “he could not find one wise man among them;” for he had been too much moved by their unjust suspicions and erroneous principles. Bildad, however, seems to have been much more angry; as if Job had counted him and his friends senseless as beasts.—And because he had said, that he “took his flesh in his teeth,” (Note, xiii. 13, 14,) alluding to his exquisite pain; Bildad ascribed it to his furious anger, which prompted him to do himself a mischief: and as he would not allow himself to be a wicked man, Bildad concluded that he wished to alter the fixed laws of God’s righteous government, in order that he might be exempted from punishment.

V. 5—21. The remainder of this chapter is a rhetorical declamation on the miseries of the wicked. There is indeed a great deal of truth and animation in the description; but the application of it to Job was unjust and cruel. It does not contain a single proof of the doctrine maintained by Bildad, namely, that the wicked are uniformly exposed to peculiar calamity in this world; or one evidence of the wickedness of Job. For the former, Bildad appealed to facts which by no means would bear him out; and the latter he thought undeniable from Job's remarkable calamities.—Yet if we include the state of retribution, as well as that of probation, we may deduce from this passage much useful instruction.—Job had said, that “his light was short because of darkness.” (Note, xvii. 11, 12.) Yea, answered Bildad, it is always so with a notoriously wicked man. A glimmering of prosperity, and a spark of hope may be given him; but both shall soon go out, and his family will share his misery. (Notes, v. 3—5. viii. 4—7. 11—19. xv. 17—35.) His most vigorous efforts to escape destruction will be unavailing, and his craftiest projects will entangle him. He is like one who ventures on forbidden ground, where nets, and snares, and traps, are placed, which he cannot escape wherever he sets his feet: or like a man in a dangerous road, where robbers meet and plunder him. In short he lives amidst alarms and terrors, and is always ready to flee as from an enemy; famine, penury, or other calamities speedily befall him; afflictions, as it were, greedily devour him; diseases prey upon his strength and comeliness; and some one more dire than the rest, like “the first-born of death,” fastens upon him and cannot be removed. Thus all his confidences fail him; and death, as “the king of” all the “terrors” which have assailed him, stares him in the face, and affrights him with the near prospect of approaching misery. Nay, destruction takes up his abode in his tabernacles: divine judgments, like the fire and brimstone which destroyed Sodom, desolate his family, and leave neither root nor branch; his memory is either lost or disgraced; he is driven into darkness and chased out of the world, as not fit to live or willing to die; (Note, Prov. xiv. 32;) and he leaves no descendant, son, or grandson, behind him: so that all who witness his doom are terrified, and all that hear of it will be astonished. Surely, concluded Bildad, this is the doom of those who are more wicked than other men.—No doubt, he meant this application for Job; as the whole description is full of evident references to his varied calamities, and his desponding complaints. (Marg. Ref.)—But how different was the event of his troubles, and the sentiments of posterity respecting him, from what Bildad supposed they would be!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

The eagerness and asperity, even of good men, when heated in controversy, are often very indecent. They are slow to hear, swift to speak, and swift to wrath; (Note, Jam. i. 19—21;) and ready to give affronts, but unable to bear them: sometimes they are led even to boast, and revile, as well as to misunderstand and misinterpret each other; to overlook all the wise and pious sentiments of their opponents; and to make the worst of every apparent error, or sally of passion. We all perceive the folly of such violence in others, and many are afterwards ashamed of it in themselves; but few are able to avoid it at the time. It is therefore generally our wisdom, especially if our spirits be eager, to shun controversy: and it is always our duty to watch and pray against pride; for if we duly considered how mean, guilty, polluted, and ignorant we really are, we should not be so much offended, even if we were “counted as “stupid as beasts,” and reputed vile in the sight of all others.—Violent anger torments those who indulge it: and, however we may fret and repine, we might as easily remove the rocks, as disannul the immovable purposes of God, or alter the measures of his wise and righteous government; so that our wisdom and duty consist in seeking grace from him, to enable us to submit, and to deduce profit from all his appointments.—It is common for angry disputants to rank their opponents among the enemies of God; to draw perverse conclusions from important truths; and to confound their own opinions, which are often erroneous, with the unerring testimonies of Scripture.—In this world there is no exact external discrimination betwixt the righteous and the wicked. Yet even on earth, which is as the wicked man's heaven, he meets with continual anxiety, terror, and vexation; with pain and sickness; with bitter disappointments to his pride, avarice, or ambition; and with galling affronts and injuries: he experiences stings of conscience, and the dread of the wrath of God; and death is to him emphatically “the king of terrors,” which threatens to tear him from all he loves, and plunge him into all he fears. These things often extort the doleful groan: though at other times he smothers his anguish in his breast, conceals it with a smile, or drowns it in hypocritical mirth, and sensual indulgence. He is continually losing his comforts, or his relish for them; and he has no calm confidence in God, no “joy in the Holy Ghost,” no lively hope, no communion with a heavenly Father, to countervail the loss. Yet he cleaves to the world, as his best, his all; and is chased out of it sorely against his will: whilst God seems to frown, and conscience forebodes that he is about to be driven from light, into eternal darkness and despair. Whether he believe it, or not, “surely such will be the “dwellings of the wicked; and this the place of him that “knoweth not God.” Thus “his light shall be put out, “and the spark of his fire shall not shine.” (Note, Prov. iv. 18, 19.) Nor will it signify to him, whether his memory be honoured, and his family flourish; or whether the one be buried in oblivion or covered with infamy, whilst the other is clean rooted out.—But they who partake of the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, are happy in the midst of their tribulations: they have hope and comfort; peace of conscience and a submissive will are their privilege; death is no longer to them “the king of terrors;” nor will they be chased out of the world, or driven from light into darkness. On the contrary, death will remove them to the land of perfect knowledge, purity, and felicity; they “shall be had in everlasting remembrance,” and they may

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 2—4. Bildad had begun both his answers to Job with, “How long?” (viii. 2. xviii. 2.) But Job thought that he had more occasion to complain of the incessant accusations of his friends, than they of his persevering self-defence. Their harsh words vexed his soul, and even broke him in pieces, destroying all his courage and confidence. They had reproached him ten times: a definite for an indefinite number. (Marg. Ref. d.) They ought to be ashamed, thus to treat their friend as a stranger, or an enemy: if indeed he were mistaken, his error chiefly hurt himself; and if he were guilty, he must bear the punishment, nay; he actually was severely suffering for his sins, and was rather an object of compassion than of severity.

V. 5—22. In these verses Job most pathetically expostulated with his friends, about their unkindness. If they determined to magnify themselves against him, by assuming the authority of judges; they ought, at least, to consider how great his miseries were, that they might be aware what cause he had to complain, and how little reason there was to add to his suffering; and that God himself was contending with him, and had overthrown him, and so entangled him in inextricable difficulties, that he could not escape. He was plundered of his substance, and as injuriously robbed of his good name; and he could not prevail to obtain a hearing of his cause, or any answer to his prayer. His path was obstructed by impassable difficulties, and covered with impenetrable darkness, so that he knew not where he was, or what to do. (Notes, Lam. iii. 2—20.) He had been stripped of his honour and authority; his possessions, family, and every hope of temporal comfort were destroyed, like a tree which is plucked up by the roots; and he had such an inward sense of God's indignation, that he was, in his own apprehensions, counted as one of his enemies. In short, the judgments of God, like armies of hostile invaders, were evidently come to besiege his tabernacle: and his friends, relations, and acquaintance, notwithstanding their attachment and obligations to him in his prosperity, were now estranged from him, and seemed scarcely to remember his name. His few remaining servants would neither obey his authority, regard his intreaties, nor afford him any relief; but kept at a distance, as disgusted with his appearance, or as despising his abject condition. Nay, his wife, forgetful of conjugal affection and duty, would not come near him in his extremity; though he intreated her sympathy and assistance, for the sake of their children, the pledges of their former love, and the occasion of their present common sorrow! Even the children of his neighbours watched his words and actions, in order to deride him; and his inward friends, to whom he had entrusted his secret thoughts, and whom he had loved for their supposed piety, were become his enemies, and abhorred him. At the same time his disease had reduced him to a mere skeleton; even his very skin was consumed, so that nothing was reserved to him entire, but his gums and his teeth.—In this wretched case he pathetically implored the compassion of his friends: God had touched him in every tender part; they needed not add their persecuting reproaches to his awful judgments, as if vested with the Lord's prerogative, and acting by his authority; and they ought, surely, to be satisfied with his outward sufferings, without wounding his spirit, or bereaving him of his hope in God.

V. 23—27. The Spirit of God seems, at this time, to have powerfully operated on the mind of Job. The gloom and tempest of his soul were dispersed; and he afterwards discoursed with more serenity and resignation. At some times he had appeared ready to despair: but here he “witnessed a good confession,” declared the soundness of his faith and the assurance of his hope, and seemed to emerge from his temptations, in the extremity of his afflictions, even as the expiring Jesus, when the depth of his inward sufferings was over, exclaimed, “It is finished,” and, “Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.” (Notes, vi. 8—13. ix. 14—21. x. 18—22. Matt. xxvi. 36—39. xxvii. 50.)—Job began by solemnly wishing that what he was about to utter, (for of that he seems to speak, rather than of the protestations of his integrity,) might be recorded in the most publick and indelible manner, “in a book,” or “with an iron pen and lead, or upon a rock for ever;” according to the several methods then in use of registering remarkable transactions: and in this God granted, nay exceeded his desires; for, being written in the sacred scriptures, his words will continue to the end of time, and be made useful to multitudes in all ages and nations. “I know,” says he, “that my Redeemer liveth.” The word translated “Redeemer,” signifies a kinsman, or near relation, to whom the redemption of captives, or of alienated estates, belonged by custom, even before the giving of the law. (Notes, Lev. xxv. 25—28. Ruth iv. 1—8.) The promised Seed of the woman, who was to assume the nature of man, and be his Redeemer, was evidently intended. Job was assured that this Redeemer of sinners, who ransoms and restores to them their forfeited inheritance, was his Redeemer; he was conscious that he embraced the promise of his coming, and expected salvation through him. He had no doubt that he was even at that time a living Redeemer: which accords to the words of Jesus, “Before Abraham was, I AM.” He believed also that “he would stand at the latter day upon the earth;” that “in the fulness of time,” he would appear as “the Seed of the woman, to bruise the serpent's head,” while his “own heel would be crushed;” that after his resurrection he would stand up as the “First-fruits of them that sleep” in the dust of the earth; and that, at the last day, he would appear as the Judge of the world, to raise the dead, to destroy this earth, and to complete the redemption of his people.—As to Job himself, though after his skin, which was almost destroyed, his body would be consumed by putrefaction; yet he should be raised again from the dead, and behold his God and Saviour. Him he should certainly behold “for himself,” as his Portion and Felicity; not only as the Object of mental contemplation, but with his own eyes, in his own body raised from the dead, and not in another. All this he firmly believed and assuredly hoped for, though at present his reins, or vitals, were consumed within him by disease, and he despaired of recovery in this world.—Other interpretations have been given of this extraordinary testimony; but none that will bear comparison with this most obvious explanation of the original.—The old translation of two verses is very literal, and worthy of notice: “For I am sure that my Redeemer liveth, and he shall stand at last upon the earth: and though after my skin, worms shall destroy this body: yet shall I see God in my flesh.”—The last clause indeed may either refer to the Redeemer's incarnation, or to his own future resurrection, or to both.

In my flesh shall I see God. (26) מִבְּשָׁרִי אֶחְיֶה אֶת־יְהוָה.—The construction of בְּשָׁרִי with the prep. מִן appears to militate against the opinion, that Job expressed his expectation of seeing God in human nature. He says, “From my flesh, &c.” That is, “My soul, residing again in my body, shall, out of it, behold God.” And he then mentions the eyes, which are, as it were, the windows of the body, and through which the soul views objects.

CHAP. XX.

Zophar, with eagerness and warmth, enlarges on the certain ruin and manifold calamities of the wicked, 1—29.

V. 28, 29. After this confident declaration of his faith and hope, Job again warned his friends no longer to persecute him; as they had sufficient evidence, that the root of divine faith and grace was planted in his heart, whence all true godliness springs: that on a careful examination, it would be found that the doctrine which he maintained sprang from the root of truth; and, that this would appear to their confusion, at the coming of the Judge. So that it would be dangerous for them to treat him as a hypocrite, or an infidel: for God in anger might visit them with some terrible calamity; and teach them by painful experience, that there is a judgment appointed, when he will avenge his servants on their enemies and calumniators.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—22.

Harsh language, from professed friends, greatly adds to the weight of outward afflictions, and destroys the inward support and comfort of the soul. They ought therefore to be ashamed, who treat with unkindness, or load with reproach, those who have a right to expect comfort and assistance from them. Yet, if our friends "magnify themselves against us," and, as unjust and unauthorized judges, condemn us as hypocrites; it is best neither to lay the matter to heart, nor to keep an account of their slanders or revilings, lest we should be tempted to harbour resentment, or to watch our opportunity of retaliation. Rather let us "look to him, who endured the contradiction of "sinners against himself;" and who was treated with far more unmerited and ungrateful insult and cruelty, than even Job was, or we can be.—But it is very distressing to one who loves God, and who has long sought happiness in the light of his countenance, to be at the same time under his severe rebukes, to experience the hiding of his face, and the sense of his displeasure, and be tempted to conclude that he is counted as one of his enemies; to be bereaved at once of outward honour, prosperity, and comfort, and of inward consolations; to have every prospect clouded with the appearance of future miseries, and the soul disquieted with grievous temptations and horrors. Yet, if in addition to all this, the character be loaded with infamy, and every friend and relative be estranged and set against the sufferer; if those diseases or afflictions, which should command sympathy and relief, only excite disgust and abhorrence, and encourage the insults of the vilest of mankind;—if this, and more, should come upon any man at once; it would only render him more conformable to the Saviour, and not in the least weaken the proof of his being a child of God, and an heir of eternal glory. Nor should we be over confident that this will not be our case. Should it please the Lord, to prove us with complicated afflictions, we know not how soon many of our friends, and even nearest relations, might forget every tie of nature, affection, and gratitude; how much our case and character might be mistaken by our most intimate religious companions; how far we might become "a reproach to the "foolish," and to the meanest of our dependents and inferiors; or how fruitless it might be, to call upon any of them to pity or to help us, when "the hand of God had "touched us;" and every one might act, as if, not satisfied with our outward trials, he was intent only on increasing our inward disquietude.—We ought then to be thankful for present exemptions, learn to sympathize with others in distress, and prepare for the worst that can befall us.

V. 23—29.

No true believer will, in any possible case, be left entirely comfortless. (Note, John xiv. 18—20.) "There is a "Friend, who loveth at all times, and a Brother, who is "born for adversity." The long-expected Redeemer once "stood upon the earth" in human nature, as our Surety, to ransom our souls by his precious blood; we are assured, that in heaven "he ever liveth to make intercession for "us;" and at the last day he will again appear, in glory, to raise the dead and to judge the world. At that solemn period all his enemies shall weep and wail because of him; but his people, raised up incorruptible, immortal, and glorious, shall see him as their God and Saviour, for themselves, in their own persons, and for their complete felicity; being made like him, and admitted to be for ever with him. Let us then give diligence, that we may be assured he is our Redeemer; and that we shall be 'numbered with his 'saints in glory everlasting.' In the prospect of this happy consummation, let us solace our minds under the pressure of sickness or poverty, the unkindness of friends and relatives, and in the prospect of death and the grave: for "though after our skin worms destroy this body, yet in "our flesh shall we see God." These faithful sayings are most durably and legibly written in the sacred Scriptures: may they be engraven by the Holy Spirit upon the tablets of our hearts; that our assured faith and hope may unite with love and gratitude, to produce devoted obedience and patient submission to the Lord. This "root of the matter" being found in us, no slander or persecution can hurt us: and though for a time we may be discomposed, we shall again recover our calm, and wait for him to plead our cause, and judge between us and our accusers.—But, on the other hand, let us be careful not to censure those, who profess faith, hope, and love to our common Redeemer, and appear to have this "root of the matter in "them;" though they differ in many things from us, and are not without infirmities. Satan has peculiarly triumphed in exciting Christians thus to persecute each other: and when believers put their hands to this work, they may as certainly expect severe chastisements in this world, as unbelieving and impenitent persecutors will experience the severity of God's vengeance upon them, in the world to come. For our Redeemer liveth, not only to save the souls of his people, but to enter into judgment with all their enemies.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—3. Zophar seems to have interrupted Job's discourse; and, not taking the least notice of the excellent things contained in it, he hastily answered to the concluding warning. He was full of thoughts upon the subject, which were, in his opinion, so pertinent, that he thought himself warranted in thus hastily interposing. He considered the check, which Job had given to the censures of his friends, as a reproach; and he thought that his own answer would be the result of sound reason, "the spirit of his understanding:" yet he spoke with great severity and harshness.—"The abrupt beginning of this speech of Zophar shews that he was in a passion, which, though he pretends to bridle it, would not let him calmly consider the protestation, which Job made of his innocence.—But he goes on in the old common-place way of the certain downfall of the wicked, be they never so powerful and well supported; which he illustrates indeed in an excellent fashion, with great variety of figures, and remarks on histories as old as the world.—All the flaw in his discourse was this, (which was common to him with the rest,) that he imagined God never varied from his method; and therefore Job, without doubt, was a very bad man; though it did not appear he was so, any other 'way, but by his infelicity.' Bp. Patrick. (Notes, v. 3—5 25—27. viii. 1—3. 20—22. ix. 22—24.)

V. 4—9. Zophar here asserted the same general truths, and fell into the same mistakes, as his friends before had done. He confounded this state of trial with the future state of retribution: he supposed that the dispensations of Providence were conducted by one invariable rule, according to the characters of men: and he misapplied his doctrine to Job, as if it evinced him to be a hypocrite.—He enquired, as in astonishment, whether Job did not know, what all reflecting men from the beginning of the world had observed, that "the triumphing of the wicked is short," and the joy of the hypocrite momentary. He might attain eminence in authority, wealth, and reputation; he might be so exalted, as to seem out of the reach of enemies and earthly vicissitudes; but he would be soon ruined, with contempt and abhorrence. Men would wonder what was become of him; he would vanish as a dream, and there would be a full end of him and of his prosperity. (Note, xv. 1—13.)

V. 10—29. In these verses, Zophar expatiated on the variety of miseries which awaited the wicked man, whether profane or hypocritical. His indigent and distressed children would court the favour of the poor, either for a morsel of bread, or to disarm their revenge for the injuries which they had endured. External compulsion, or inward remorse, would constrain him to restore their property. The licentiousness of his youth would expose him to dreadful diseases in his old age, and bring him down to the grave. The wickedness which he delighted in, concealed, spared, and would not forsake, but reserved as a sweet morsel to eat secretly, would create him such inward horror, such dreadful diseases, and such dire miseries, that it would be like the venom of the asp, or as if he had been bitten by the viper. He would be disappointed of all his expected pleasure and ease; and, along with his ill-gotten wealth, he would be deprived of all which he had laboured for, as a punishment of his injustice and oppression. He would have no comfort of his riches, while they remained; and he would be stripped of all, (as Job had been,) and have nothing for any one to covet. This would come upon him suddenly, in the height of his prosperity, by a combination of wicked men, as it had on Job. Nay, just when he would be ready to say, "Soul, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry;" God himself would pour the fury of his wrath upon him. (Notes, Num. xi. 31—34. Luke xii. 15—21.) There would be no escaping from the weapons of divine indignation; his inward terrors would equal his outward calamities, so that every kind of misery would be laid up in store against him. "A fire not blown should consume him." "He should be destroyed, as by a slow fire, a fire not rendered intense by blowing; but greatly aggravating and prolonging his miseries by its tardy but irresistible progress: for the judgments of God, without the intervention of men, would desolate his family. If his wickedness were before masked with hypocrisy, it should thus be brought to light. Persons of all descriptions would unite against him, and all which he had possessed would be totally dissipated. For this was uniformly "the portion of a wicked man from God," and his appointed heritage.—The reference in all this is manifest, not only to Job's calamities, but also to his complaints. His outward losses and inward anguish; the triumphs of his enemies, and the unkindness of his friends and relatives, are evidently hinted at. Says Zophar, "This is the heritage of a wicked man;" and therefore doubtless thou art one. (Notes, 1—3. xviii. 5—21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They are frequently the most forward to dispute, who are most evidently in the wrong. We are pleased with our own thoughts, as with our own children; and fancy that others will equally admire them. Thus we are led to make indecent haste to speak, lest we should lose the credit and gratification of our pertinent observations; and lest others should lose the benefit of them. In this eagerness we consider each "check" as a reproach, and every effusion of passion is esteemed a demonstration. But others generally judge very differently: nay, we ourselves can seldom reflect afterwards on such debates, without shame and remorse. It is very difficult for men of warm passions entirely to repress this unbecoming propensity: but watchfulness and prayer will do great things, in a course of time; and we may profit by observing our own and others' errors, and by the rebukes and corrections of our heavenly Father.—We must not limit the dispensations of God by our rules; nor censure others out of fondness for our own notions. But though the wicked do often prosper even to the end of life: yet it is a decided matter among all wise men from the beginning hitherto, that "the triumphing of the wicked," and "the joy of the hypocrite," are transient and fleeting; and that they shall shortly perish disgracefully and for ever. Some kinds of wickedness generally ruin men's constitutions, if they are not cut off before they entail pain and disease on their old age, which carries them down to the grave; and the pleasures and gains of sin, like drinking sweet poison, or like the lulling venom of the asp, terminate in remorse, in anguish, and in ruin. A curse from God often corrodes the oppressor's abundance: he hath no enjoyment of it, and suffers none of those connected with him to have any ease or pleasure; and very often it is torn from him in an awful and sudden manner. "There is no peace, saith my God, for the wicked." (Notes, Is. xlviii. 20—22. lvii. 20, 21.)—But what are all weapons of iron and steel; yea, what is darkness or consuming fire, compared with the eternal vengeance of the Almighty, which is the heritage appointed unto the wicked in the world to come? There the hypocrite shall be detected, and have his portion with the unbelievers;

a xlii. 8, 4. xviii. 2. Job intreats a patient hearing, because of his singular calamities, 1—6. He shews that wicked men sometimes so prosper, as to grow bold in presumption, 7—16. (Note, Rom. ii. 7—11.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1—6. In this chapter Job discourses less on his own calamities, and more directly answers his opponents. He introduces his subject by intreating their attention, and desiring that they would neither interrupt him, as Zophar had; nor disregard and misunderstand his words, as they all had hitherto done. This he would take instead of those consolations, which he had vainly expected from them; and if, after a fair hearing, his discourse was found impertinent, and his reasonings inconclusive, he would consent that Zophar (whom he particularly addressed) should renew his mockery. Indeed, his complaint and appeal were directed to God, and not to them: otherwise his spirit might well be troubled, when sarcasms and reproaches were all which they afforded him, under his unprecedented sufferings. (Notes, vi. 1—7.) Yet, if they looked upon him, they might see misery sufficient to demand compassion: and, as they knew no evil against him, their bold interpretations of this mysterious providence should be turned into silent astonishment. For every recollection of the dreadful change, which he had experienced, filled him with trembling and consternation.

V. 7—16. If the doctrine, maintained by Zophar and Job's other opponents, was true, and Providence discriminated uniformly between the righteous and the wicked; how was it, that so many wicked men lived, grew old, and continued in power and prosperity to the last? Perhaps no instance had occurred, of a truly pious person being so suddenly and dreadfully afflicted, as Job had been; and it was not possible for man to distinguish exactly between the true believer and the hypocrite. But it was undeniable, that numbers of notoriously profane and wicked men were advanced to wealth and authority, continued in prosperity to old age, and witnessed their posterity established in the most desirable settlements, before their death; that they were often more free from alarm and correction than others; that their cattle and substance rapidly increased; that their children, whom they trained up in vanity, sensuality, and dissipation, multiplied, and were in health and peace around them; that they lived even to extreme old age, (for so the original word signifies,) in outward ease and indulgence, and died without any remarkable pain or distress. So that, if men were to judge merely by outward prosperity, the wicked might be pronounced the most happy, and even the favourites of Heaven. Yet they grew more impious and presumptuous, even by prosperity; they openly cast off all regard to God, and neither knew, nor desired to learn, any thing about his truths, ordinances, and precepts; they despised his favour, defied his vengeance, and counted his service and worship irksome and unprofitable. (Notes, ix. 22—24. xii. 6—10. xv. 17—35. xx. 10—29. Ps. xvii. 13—15. lxxiii. 1—17. Jer. xii. 1—4. Mal. iii. 13—18.)—Now it must be allowed, that the Almighty, whom they despised and affronted, gave and continued to them these their good things, and could take them away when he pleased; nor were they so in their own hand, that they could retain them for a moment. Job, indeed, for his part, was far from approving their counsel or conduct, or desiring their prosperity; though his friends inferred, that he thought the wicked happy, because he

V. 17—22. All these verses may be read interrogatively. “How often” does it happen, that the prosperity of wicked men is extinguished with sudden and awful judgments? Sometimes indeed it is so, but more frequently, they live and die in outward ease and peace. “How often” does God in his anger distribute to them uncommon calamities, rendering them as stubble, or chaff, before the tempestuous wind? “How often” is it observed, that their iniquities are punished upon their children, while their eyes behold their destruction, and they know that they drink of the wrath of the Almighty, as a recompence for their crimes?—It had been laid down as a general rule, that God almost uniformly visited wicked men, with these and similar judgments: yet, in fact, instances in which they were clearly thus distinguished from others, but seldom occurred. And if they prospered till death, whether they lived till old age, or died in the vigour of life, the subsequent condition of their families would not affect them, either with pleasure or pain. Indeed, who shall presume to teach the Judge of the most exalted creatures, in what way he should administer his government? Or who shall presume to explain, or decide on, any of his dispensations, as if inconsistent with his justice or wisdom?

V. 23—26. Job, from his appeal to facts, justly inferred, that there was no exact discrimination observed in these dispensations. One haughty sinner comes peaceably to his end, having experienced a continual series of health, indulgence, and success; like cattle that feed in rich pastures. Others, perhaps not so wicked, never know any thing but pain, sickness, poverty, and trouble, and die in anguish and distress. Thus both go down to the dust alike, and become food for the worms.

The words translated, “His breasts are full of milk (24),” are differently interpreted. The word rendered breasts is not elsewhere used in the Hebrew; and some think it means milk-pails. But others, supposing it to coincide with the subsequent clause, thus translate the passage, “His ribs, (sides, or intestines, viscera,) are full of fat:” τα δε εγκατα αυτε πληρη σεατος. Sept. Probably this is the true sense of the words.—Perhaps עִצְבוֹת may be derived from the root עָבַר, he covered, or inclosed: as the Latin abdomen from abdo, to hide.

V. 27—30. Here Job brings the matter to an issue. He knew that his friends wrongfully condemned him, as one who had usurped or abused his authority, and who had been an unjust, oppressive magistrate, and a hypocrite; and that they considered his desolated habitation as the proof of his guilt. But any common traveller, to whom they might refer the case, could point out the flourishing habitations and splendid monuments of the ungodly, which they observed in their journeys: from these tokens they would conclude, that wicked men were not punished here, but were frequently exempted from the calamities which overtook others; being reserved to the day of wrath and destruction in another world. CHAP. XXII.

Eliphaz shews that man's goodness cannot profit God, 1—4. He accuses Job of various crimes, which dare call them to account, or reprove them: and at last they die in peace, are buried with magnificence, and sleep as quietly in the grave as others do. Death indeed closes their prosperity; but none, except two, have been, or ever shall be, exempted from this common doom: so that it is evident, there is no exact discrimination between the righteous and the wicked, in the outward dispensations of Providence. (Notes, Ec. iv. 1—3. v. 8. Hab. i. 2—4.)

V. 34. Job concluded with enquiring, why his friends comforted him in vain, with the hopes of returning worldly prosperity, in case he repented and sought unto the Lord. For there was no truth in their system; nay, there was falsehood interwoven with all their answers, which rendered them inconclusive, and inapplicable to the subject.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

It is not easy to obtain an attentive hearing from eager disputants. Interruption and disregard are commonly reciprocal; hence misapprehension, unfair conclusions, and unmerited contempt and reproach: and when men have been suffered to speak, and have spoken to the purpose, their opponents commonly "mock on," and treat the whole as trivial and contemptible. But this behaviour is peculiarly improper to the afflicted, who should at least have the consolation of being heard with patience and candour.—We might well yield to inward disquietude, if we had none to complain to in our distresses but man; or if the Lord were as severe against us, as our brethren sometimes are. But the true believer may speak to God at all times; and he will compassionately regard those complaints, and bear with those infirmities, which men disregard or condemn.—The afflictions of the faithful, compared with the prosperity of the wicked, have caused astonishment and discouragement to the servants of God in all ages. But we should adore the depths of those judgments which we cannot fathom: and the clear light of the gospel, with the discoveries of the eternal world, will explain the difficulty, and shew the wise designs of God in all these dispensations. Yet, under severe trials and temptations, the most established believer finds it as hard to apply his principles for immediate encouragement, as the most skillful mariner in a furious storm does to manage the vessel by the rules of navigation.—It is undeniable, that wicked men often grow rich and great, establish flourishing families, escape alarms and corrections, succeed in their projects, train up their children in pleasure; and, after a life of splendour and indulgence, go down to the grave in old age, without any remarkable calamity: yea, they are interred with magnificence, and many vain attempts are made to abate the horror of death, and the noisomeness of the grave. It is equally certain, that this has emboldened impiety and infidelity; and led many to infer, that there is no God, or that he takes no notice of human affairs, and that religion and morality are needless or useless.—Prosperity adds strength to men's pride and fuel to their lusts; and thus they grow hardened in presumptuous wickedness.—Alas, what numbers do we see in this land, where the light of the gospel clearly shines, whose actions say unto God, "Depart from us!" Their open and constant violation of his law, and their contempt of his gospel; their profanation of his day, and desertion of his ordinances; their families left without the least appearance of religion; their incessant course of riot or dissipation; their inordinate pursuit of wealth or power; their discourse, devoid of all reverence to the name, truths, or precepts of God, and full of levity and folly, if not of ribaldry and profaneness:—these things seem to "say unto God, Depart from us; we desire not the knowledge of thy ways." Such persons do not desire to think, hear, speak, or read about him: they treat religion, as if it were beneath their rank, spirit, or genius: they do not deem the Almighty on any account entitled to their obedience or gratitude; and they suppose his service to be a mere drudgery, which can yield neither pleasure nor profit, and in neglecting which there can be no danger! Yet "these prosper in the world, and have riches in possession." And, though the Lord is sometimes "known by the judgments that he executes;" yet they and their families are seldom visited by remarkable calamities. Indeed they, as well as others, must shortly die: but many of them outwardly enjoy more pleasure and suffer less pain, while they live and when they die, than their pious neighbours. And though the pomp of their funerals, and the panegyrick of their flatterers, will afford them no real advantage, yet they fare as well as others: and whether their children prosper or are afflicted, after their death, it adds nothing to their joy or sorrow. It is evident, that their good things are bestowed upon them by God: yet he "distributes sorrows in his anger;" and, however spared for a time, they are as stubble before the wind, and as chaff for the fire of his indignation. For, indeed, it avails little whether wicked men enjoy on earth all the delights of sense, without pain, sickness, or hardship; or whether they live and die without enjoyment and in bitterness; as they are all "reserved to the day of wrath" and destruction, and the misery which is beyond the grave will swallow up all their former comfort. As they have said to God, "Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways:" they cannot reasonably expect any other event, than that He, the Fountain of felicity and Judge of the world, should at last say to them, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." (Note, Matt. xxv. 41—46.)

V. 17—34.

We are not competent to declare what God, the universal Judge, ought to do, or to comment on what he does: nor should we deem ourselves the objects of his love, or of his wrath, because of outward dispensations; or condemn any as sinners above other men, because visited with remarkable calamities: for in all conclusions and arguments of this kind, there is error, presumption, and self-sufficiency. (Notes, Luke xiii. 1—5.) The wicked man may suffer many dreadful calamities on earth, and must have many peculiar terrors and vexations; he wants that peace of conscience, that confidence in God, and that he supposes had brought on him his calamities, 5—14. He contrasts the doom of sinners visited by divine judgments, with the security of the righteous, 15—20. He exhorts Job to repent, and encourages him to hope for mercy, 21—30.

THEN Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said, hope of heaven, which the believer enjoys: prosperity increases his guilt, and strengthens his distempered passions: he has all his good things here, and nothing to look for hereafter, but unmixed and eternal misery, and may expect to be banished from the presence of God hereafter; while the righteous has all his evil here, and unmingled and eternal good in another world. (Note, Luke xvi. 24—26.) As, therefore, we are all speedily drawing toward the grave, must we not certainly conclude, that the most adverse lot of a true believer is infinitely preferable to the greatest prosperity of an unbeliever? Let us then put "far from us the counsel of the wicked;" let us seek the Lord, and desire the knowledge of his ways; let us count his service our liberty and pleasure; and the privilege of praying to him, our highest honour and richest charter. Let us look forward to the general judgment and the eternal world; and we shall see the prosperity of the wicked, and the trials of the righteous, perfectly consonant with the eternal wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness of God; and must cheerfully conclude, even when under his sharply correcting rod, that they, and they only, are blessed, who trust and serve him. (Note, Ps. lxxiii. 23—28.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1—4. Eliphaz still supposed Job to maintain that God favoured the wicked; and therefore he addressed him the third time. He intended, in this introduction, to shew that God, in all his appointments, acted out of pure love to justice, and was not influenced by interested or selfish affections.—He has nothing to fear, or hope, from any of his creatures; his essential glory and felicity receive no accession from their obedience, however perfect; he is not excited by the greatness of any one, to institute a legal process against him to bring him down; nor can any one make him his debtor. A wise man consults his own advantage by serving God, but he cannot profit him by so doing. The Lord indeed approves and delights in holiness, because it is right in itself, and conducive to personal and social happiness; but not because he is any gainer by it. His justice therefore must be invariable and impartial; his rewards are the result of his love of good; and his punishments spring entirely from hatred of evil. (Notes, Ps. xvi. 2, 3. Luke xvii. 7—10.)—These are great truths, and were well understood by the disputants, though here rather incautiously stated: but Eliphaz and his associates, confounding this state of trial, with that of future retribution, misapplied them to the case of Job; as if the justice of God could not be vindicated, unless he were proved to be a wicked man!

V. 5—14. In these verses Eliphaz brought as particular a charge against Job, as if he had had evidences ready to prove every tittle: yet he had no reason for his rash accusation, except that Job was visited, as he supposed God always visited every wicked man, and none else! He demanded, whether Job could deny the greatness and immense number of his crimes?—Indeed all have committed innumerable sins, in which there is an inconceivable degree of criminality: but Eliphaz did not mean such transgressions as were common to Job with other believers, or even with men in general; but flagrant iniquities and impieties, which he had cloaked with the mask of hypocrisy.—He therefore directly charged him with depriving his poor brethren of their mean and scanty clothing, by taking it in pledge for debts which he unjustly claimed; and by withholding bread and water, or needful relief, from those who were perishing by want; of decreeing as a judge, in behalf of the rich and powerful, for their favour and bribes; and of sending away the widows and orphans

The unexpected calamities, with which Job was surrounded and entangled, were the punishment of these oppressions: and it was no wonder that he complained of being involved in darkness, distracted with terrors, and overwhelmed with afflictions, like impetuous torrents, when he was guilty of such crimes.—Some think, he meant that Job was blinded by his selfish prejudices, or judicially involved in mental darkness; or he would readily have perceived the reason of his calamities.—All parties were agreed that God displayed his presence and glory in heaven, and was infinitely exalted above all creatures: but Eliphaz charged Job with inferring from this, that God “could not know,” or did not notice, the actions of men, which were concealed by the intervening clouds; or that, satisfied with the enjoyment of his own felicity, he disregarded the affairs of his creatures. So that, if Job were not a direct atheist, he implicitly denied the divine perfections and providence; and therefore he feared no punishment for cloaking his injustice with the shew of piety, and vindicating his character, when visited by the just judgments of God. (Notes, Ps. x. 2—11. lxxiii. 11. xciv. 1—9. Ez. viii. 7—12. Zeph. i. 12.)

V. 15—20. Eliphaz here evidently adverted to the general deluge. The earth was then filled with violence; men had said unto God, “Depart from us;” and they enquired concerning Noah and his few associates, “What can the Almighty do for them?” (Notes, Gen. vi. 11, 12.

17.) But, though their houses were for a time filled, by a bountiful Providence, with good things, what way did they at length tread? They were cut down by an awful judgment, and the foundation of their confidence was overflowed and destroyed with the flood. (Notes, Gen. vii. 10—23. Matt. xxiv. 36—41.) This was well known; and therefore Eliphaz maintained that such judgments befall notorious sinners; and thought that he had the best reason to use Job's words, “The counsel of the wicked is far from me.” (xxi. 16.) And, as it was always matter of exultation and triumph to the righteous, when wicked oppressors were thus ruined; Job had no reason to wonder that they seemed to mock at his calamities and complaints, whom they considered to be such an one. “But,” added he, “our substance,” who are really godly men, “is not thus cut down;” while the vengeance of God, like fire, consumes every remnant of those who by their crimes are proper fuel for it. Perhaps he alluded to the destruction of Sodom. (Notes, Gen. xix. 24—29. Luke xvii. 32—37.)—Eliphaz's arguments and precedents by no means proved, that wicked men were always thus visited in this world. The Sabeans and Chaldeans did not act with greater injustice to Job, than he did, in this rash condemnation of him: and as he ascribed his own exemption, and that of his friends, to their piety, rather than to God's mercy, his discourse also savoured of pride and ingratitude.

V. 21—30. The former part of Eliphaz's answer must be condemned; but much of this conclusion merits great commendation, though it implied that Job had hitherto been a stranger to true religion, and that temporal pro-

Job longs to plead his cause before God, being assured of a favourable event, 1—7. He laments that prosperity would be the sure consequence of his sincere conversion. It contained, however, excellent advice and suitable encouragements. He exhorted Job to get acquainted with the divine perfections, and to seek an experimental knowledge of “the God of salvation,” whom a sinner may approach by faith and prayer. Thus he might have peace with him, and in his own conscience; and all possible good would be the consequence. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxviii. 9. John xvii. 1—3.) The revelations, which God had made to others, or would make to him, of his truth and will, should be received with submission of understanding, and with humble faith, and laid up in his heart as the principles and rule of his future obedience. Thus, returning to the Almighty, as his God and Portion, he would remove every kind of injustice far from his tabernacles; and might expect to have a prosperity built upon a firm foundation. He would grow rich in gold and silver; nay, the Lord would be his Treasure and Defence: he should have great delight and confidence in him; his prayers would be readily heard and answered; and he would be continually reminded to perform the vows which accompanied them. His purposes would be established; his path would be comfortable; and when the wicked were cast down, he would recollect with joyful exultation, how the Lord had lifted him up from his abject condition, and preserved him from similar calamities, after he had humbled himself before him. Eliphaz, perhaps meant, that when the righteous were afflicted or cast down, Job would be honoured as their helper and comforter; and that his pious example, endeavours, and fervent prayers, would render him a blessing to his neighbours, and to his country, in preserving it from publick calamities, and promoting the cause of religion and righteousness. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

True wisdom consists with seeking our own interest, yea, in seeking it, provided it be our true and everlasting interest, and we seek it in that way which God hath revealed: and godliness is always profitable to the possessor, having “the promise both of the life that now is, and of “that which is to come.” (Notes, 1 Tim. iv. 6—10. vi. 6—10.) But it is absurd to suppose, that we can be profitable to God, or merit any thing at his hands. Even the perfect obedience of angels, in these respects, is entirely unavailing: how much more then the defective services of polluted sinners! All our comforts therefore flow from the unmerited mercy of our God; and under all our afflictions we should acknowledge, that we suffer less than we deserve. He indeed acts as a Sovereign, who gives no account of his conduct to the presumptuous objector; but his sovereignty is perfectly wise, righteous, faithful, good, and merciful. He approves of the image of his own holiness, and delights in the fruits of his own Spirit; and he

he cannot perceive the presence of God: but is confident that God knows his way, and will bring him forth as gold, 8—10. He attests his own integrity, 11, 12; but is troubled by the immutable counsel of God, 13—17.

graciously accepts the thankful services of the humble believer, while he rejects the proud claim of the self-confident Pharisee.—It is, however, grievous to reflect, that many who speak excellently on the perfections of God, so far from being “imitators of him, as beloved children,” behave towards others in direct contrariety to this perfect pattern; and even cloke their own injustice and severity, by expatiating on the divine mercy and justice! Even good men frequently thus transgress, when being eager in disputation, they harshly censure or falsely accuse their brethren. Let us then beware of this common offence. Let us pity and defend such, as are suffering under the cruel injury of slanderous tongues. But should it be our lot to be thus afflicted, let us remember how Job was treated; yea, how Jesus was reviled; that we may be patient under the trial, and “not render railing for railing.” And let us examine ourselves, whether there be not some plausible ground for the reproach: that our minds may feel a deeper abhorrence of the crimes, of which we are accused, and that we may more watchfully avoid all appearance of them.—The injustice, rapine, cruelty to the poor, and oppression of the widow, the orphan, and the destitute, which too often prevail even in the place of judgment, or in the palaces of the great, evidently prove that numbers are practical atheists or infidels; that they have no proper sense of the perfections and authority of God; no realizing apprehensions of his presence with them, and his knowledge of their secret sins or secret thoughts; or no conviction that for “all these things he will bring them into judgment.”

V. 15—30.

How generally is the invisible God forgotten by men! “He is not in all their thoughts.” But they would do well to mark the old way of the transgressors before the flood, and that of the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah. More dreadful will be the doom of impenitent sinners ere long; however at present they prosper in their crimes, and their houses are filled with good things. Therefore every wise man will agree in saying, “The counsel of the wicked “be far from me.”—In this world we ought not to be “glad “at the calamities” even of the wicked. Instead of insulting over them when afflicted, we should pity them, and pray for their conversion; and we must by no means ascribe it to our own piety, but to the divine mercy, if we are exempted from grievous calamities. But hereafter, when the day of patience and grace shall be ended, and the wicked shall be cast into hell, the redeemed will cry out with exultation, “So let all thine enemies perish, O “LORD!”—Let us then here acquaint ourselves with him, that we may be reconciled to him, and enjoy his “peace, “which passeth all understanding:” thus, everlasting good will come unto us. Blessed be his name, we have immense advantages, which these ancient believers had not; we have both his precepts and his promises, his law and his gospel, in our hands: may we receive them as the words of his mouth, and treasure them up in our hearts: may we return unto him by living faith, and cleave to him in holy love; and shew the reality of our conversion, by casting away all our transgressions, renouncing all our idols, obeying his commandments, and acquiescing in his will. Then, whether we be rich or poor, prosperous or afflicted, "the Almighty will be our Shield," and our Delight; (Notes, Ps. xliii. 4. lxxxiv. 11, 12;) our prayers will be heard and our thanksgivings will abound; our purposes will be established, and a light will shine upon our paths; we shall be preserved when the wicked perish; be lifted up from every depth of affliction; and, having been humbled under his mighty hand, we shall be exalted to the throne of glory. In the mean time, our examples, endeavours, prayers, and influence, will be useful in preserving or delivering some from sin and misery: and, whatever be our judgment of the character of others, we may safely recommend to them the same course, as the certain way to present peace and future felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 2. Job's complaints were bitter, and his friends thought them rebellious; (as the word properly signifies:) but he maintained, that the calamities with which he had been visited, and the anguish which he felt, exceeded all that he could express.—The verse may be read as an exclamation: "Oh, that to-day my complaint should be accounted rebellion!" Or, as an interrogation: "Is my complaint, even to-day, rebellion? When my stroke is heavier than my groaning!"

V. 3—7. Job perceived, that his friends were resolved to condemn him; he therefore referred his cause to the judgment of God, and he was earnest to have it decided, as by a special commission.—Eliphaz had exhorted him to "acquaint himself with God;" and to this Job seems to have referred, when he vehemently expressed his desire of knowing where he might find him. He longed to know where and how he might carry his appeal into the presence of God, and before his tribunal, that it might be determined, whether he was a righteous man, or a hypocrite; which was the point on which he and his opponents were at issue. He was assured that "the judgment of God" would be "according to truth:" before him he could order his cause with confidence, and produce many and conclusive arguments in his own vindication. He should then know what God would answer; and he did not fear submitting to his award: he seems also to have hoped that he should then understand the reason of his uncommon afflictions. He was assured, that God would not crush him by his power, or condemn him by prerogative; but would rather support him by his grace, and encourage him by his condescension, in ordering his cause before him. So that an upright person, when calumniated and condemned by man, might be allowed to argue the matter before God; and, having appealed to his mercy as a Saviour, and being declared a justified believer, he would have nothing more to fear from his just and holy Judge.—Some think that he meant Eliphaz, who, as his self-constituted judge, had already most unjustly brought him in guilty of many atrocious crimes, and pronounced sentence against him.—Job's consciousness of his integrity, and his confidence that the Lord would graciously decide in his favour, were well grounded: but there was a great want of reverence, humility, and patience, in his vehement manner of stating his desires; and in fact, the Lord did at last silence Job, by shewing him his presumption, in thus pleading against his almighty Sovereign. (Notes, xxxviii. 1—3. xl. 1—8. xlii. 1—6. 1 Cor. iv. 3—5.)

V. 8—12. Job was sensible that God was every where present, and he was troubled at his presence as the Author of his calamities (15): but his mind was in such confusion, that he could get no fixed apprehension of his merciful presence, so as to obtain comfort and support by spreading his case before him; and he could perceive no tokens of the Lord's approach to deliver him, or to silence his accusers. His efforts were all fruitless, and his views gloomy. The powerful operations of God were discernible: but his gracious presence was hid in anger; and he seemed to stand at a distance, or to frown upon him. Yet Job was assured that the heart-searching God knew and approved his general conduct and character; and that when his integrity had been suitably tried, he should be brought forth, purified as gold from the furnace. For he was conscious that he was an upright believer; that he had obeyed the commands of God, and followed the example of his justice and goodness; and that he had steadily kept that path, without declining, turning back, or growing weary. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 21—28. 2 Cor. i. 12—14.) Nay, he had experienced more pleasure in the truth and commandments of the Lord, than in his necessary food; and would sooner have gone without his stated meals, than have deviated from his service. (Notes, Ps. xix. 7—11. cxix. 97—105. Jer. xv. 15—18.)—In these and similar protestations, it is evident that Job continually referred to the charges brought against him, and the advice given him, by his friends. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—17. At this time, Job seems to have felt that his vehement wishes and protestations were altogether vain, because he was aware that the purposes of God were irreversible, and his power irresistible; so that neither persuasion nor opposition could induce him to deviate from his settled plan. It was God's decree and fixed purpose thus to afflict him, though he knew not on what account; but there were many such deep mysteries in Providence. (Notes, xxxiv. 20—30. Dan. iv. 34—37. Rom. xi. 33—36.) The presence of the Almighty therefore filled him with terror, and melted his heart with anguish: and he could not conceive, why he had not been cut off by death before these days of darkness; or why God would not cover him in the grave, from the view of such distresses.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They, and they alone, who have experienced the conflict between faith and unbelief, hope and despondency, the desire to submit, and the opposing power of self-will, during severe trials and sharp temptations, can clearly understand or account for the fluctuations observable in Job's language, and the state of his mind whence they arose: (Note, ix. 14—21 :) and the consideration, that so eminent a servant of God was harassed and perplexed, exactly as they are, cannot fail to afford them some relief. But our bitter complaints are very apt to savour of rebellion; and we should watch over ourselves in such circumstances, lest we provoke the Lord to increase his corrections.—When we meet with unkind treatment or unjust censures, we should seek help and comfort from him: yet we ought to come in humble reverence, and wait his time with patience. Blessed be God, we may know where to find him: he is “in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself;” and upon a mercy-seat, “waiting to be gracious.” Thither the sinner may go for salvation; and there the believer may order his cause, and fill his mouth with arguments, taken from the perfections, promises, covenant, and glory of God, whatever his special requests may be. Nor need we ever be at a loss for a conclusive argument, why he should pardon, teach, protect, comfort, and help us, if we trust his mercy and seek his glory. He will answer our enquiries by his word, and our prayers in his providence, and by his Spirit; and cause us to understand and approve his decisions. He will not crush or overawe us with his absolute power, but assist and encourage our supplications: and the only way to be delivered from our offended Judge, is to appeal to his mercy as our loving Saviour; for “there is no condemnation” for those who are indeed true believers in Jesus Christ. (Note, Rom. viii. 1, 2.)—Yet, even for them, there may be many temptations, sorrows, and perplexities: they may lose the sense of the favour of their God, and, for a season, seek it in every ordinance, and by every means, in vain. But he knows and approves their path; he notices all their trials and difficulties; he will give them some distant intimation of a happy event; and when their uprightness is manifested, their graces increased, and their dross consumed, they shall come forth as the purest and most precious gold. But the Christian, of whom we speak, is conscious of having uprightly embraced the salvation of God, and set out in his ways, by repentance, faith, and true conversion; he has held his steps, and kept his path, without turning aside for the sake of worldly advantages, or for fear of the cross. Many false steps indeed he has made; but he has not been left to walk in the way of allowed sin: he obeys unreservedly, from love, and with the constancy of patient expectation. The word of God has been the food of his soul: he has an appetite for it; he relishes and digests it, converts it into nourishment, and is strengthened by it for service and for conflict. In his habitual judgment, he would rather want animal recreation, and starve with hunger, than be deprived of the spiritual sustenance of his soul: and therefore he takes pleasure in searching the scripture, and in attending on the ordinances of God. (Notes, Ps. xlii. 1—3. lxiii. 1—6. lxxxiv. 1, 2. Cant. i. 4.) Those who answer this description, may be alarmed and troubled at afflictive events; they may be disquieted at the view of the unchangeable decrees and irresistible sovereignty of God; and be perplexed about the reasons of his appointments. They may even think that the Almighty delights to trouble them, and wish that they had died before their trials; but this is their weakness, temptation, and sin. For nothing can come upon them, but what is appointed by infinite wisdom and love, and in order to humble, soften, and sanctify them; nothing, but what shall terminate in their benefit, and that of their brethren, and redound to the glory of God: and, in their sober judgment, they would be willing to endure darkness and distress for a time, for these important purposes. May we then learn to obey and trust the Lord, even under tribulation; be willing to die when he pleases, for we know not from what evils we may thus be exempted; and to live as long as he sees good, as we are not aware for what good purposes our lives may be prolonged.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1. If God uniformly punished the wicked in this life, according to the opinion of Eliphaz and his friends; Job supposed, that wise and godly men, who are acquainted with him and his ways, would be able to give some account of the times of vengeance; to conclude how long the prosperity of the wicked would last; and to predict how it would terminate, and what degree of misery proportioned to their crimes would be inflicted: as those, acquainted with the mind of the prince, and the laws of the land, can foresee and expect the sentence, which will shortly be pronounced and executed upon notorious malefactors. There are days appointed for their trial, and penalties annexed to their crimes, and we know what to expect, as to the murderer or traitor. Doubtless, the Governor of the world also has his appointed times of vengeance; but why are they not discovered to his people? Why are they not marked or evident? They certainly would be, if exact justice were awarded in this world; and as they are not, it is evident that the time of trial, and of executing vengeance, is not appointed in this life. (Note, Ec. ix. 1—3.)

V. 2—12. In these verses Job proves from facts, that notorious tyrants, oppressors, and robbers, frequently escape adequate punishment in this world. Unjust rulers, under cover of law, often deprive men of their estates; and take away their cattle and substance, as if forfeited: they oppress the orphans and widows, and drive the poor into concealment or banishment. Many likewise disdain the yoke of obedience to God or man, as the wild ass refuses to labour; and rapine and plunder are their daily employments. Thus troops of Ishmaelitic free-booters lived in the wilderness, by robbing the travellers: others reaped the corn, or gathered in the vintage, from the lands which they had violently seized; while the poor sufferers, whom they had ruined, were exposed, without clothing or shelter, to the inclemencies of the weather, and driven to make the rocks their refuge, and to live like wild beasts. Such tyrants would pluck away the fatherless children from their weeping mothers, to be their slaves; and take the children of the widows, or of any poor persons, into bondage, as a pledge for some debt, contracted to keep their families from perishing. (Notes, xxii. 5—14. Neh. v. 1—13. Jam. v. 1—6.) They regarded not the hunger, thirst, or nakedness even of those, who laboured to support their luxury: but would take away the sheaf which the poor had gleaned; and suffer them to perish for hunger and thirst, amidst the abundance, with which they were surrounded, and about which their labours had been employed. Men, thus wounded and crushed by oppression, publicly expressed their anguish in groans and lamentations; yet God inflicted no remarkable punishment upon the criminals, proportioned to their guilt, or equal to the miseries of the oppressed. Thus, in this life he did not expose and punish their folly, or impute folly unto them; as he certainly will do, when he shall “render to every man according to his works.”—The words translated “they take away the sheaf from the hungry” (10), may be rendered, “They are hungry that carry the sheaf:” that is, Their reapers starve.

13 They are of those that ^a rebel against the light; ^a they know not the ways thereof, ^b nor abide in the paths thereof.

14 The ^c murderer rising with the light killeth the poor and needy, and ^d in the night is as a thief.

15 The ^e eye also of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight, saying, 'No eye shall see me: and ^f disguiseth his face.

16 In ^g the dark they dig through houses, which they had marked for themselves in the day-time; ^h they know not the light.

17 For the morning ⁱ is to them even as the shadow of death: if ^j one know them they are ^k in the terrors of the shadow of death.

V. 13-17. Job here followed up his argument, by bringing instances of criminals, who escaped detection, and eluded justice, as those before mentioned out-braved it. Such persons "rebelled against the light," as if enemies to the sun; shunning all intercourse with it, as not being able to endure the discoveries which it would make. They therefore lay still all day; or only went out to mark their prey, and to make observations and form plans. Thus the murderer "rising with," or before, "the day-break," lay in wait for the early traveller, to murder him; or he spent the night in robbery. The adulterer waited for the dusk of the evening, and secretly, or having put a mask on his face, repaired to the haunts of his shameful practices. The house-breaker likewise concealed himself till all were asleep, and then forced his way into the habitations of honest men to plunder them; even digging through the walls, which perhaps were made of clay. All these offenders hated day-light; they dreaded the approach of morning, before they had accomplished their crimes; and detection was as death to them. (Notes, John iii. 19-21. Eph. v. 8-14. 1 Thes. v. 1-11.) Thus they often, through life, escaped the punishment due to their crimes.

V. 18-20. These atrocious offenders, and many others, proceeded swiftly and silently, like the gliding stream, into every iniquity: they acquired a portion on earth by such accursed practices, without bestowing pains to cultivate the land; spending their time in deserts, and being seldom seen in the ways towards the vineyards, which were frequented by those who laboured in them.—Yet, as dry weather and heat evaporate the waters, arising from the melted snows, or they sink into the earth imperceptibly and unnoticed: so numbers of these criminals went down unobserved into the grave. They were not ignominiously suspended on gibbets, to be devoured by the fowls of the snow-waters: ^a so doth the grave those ^b which have sinned.

20 The womb shall forget him; ^c the worm shall feed sweetly on him; ^d he shall be no more remembered; and ^e wickedness shall be broken as a tree.

21 He ^f evil entreateth the barren ^g that beareth not: and ^h doeth not good to the widow.

22 He ⁱ draweth also the mighty with his power: he riseth up, and ^j no man is sure of life.

air; but were buried, and became a delicious morsel for the worms. And, as no remarkable misery or disgrace attended their lives or deaths, even their mothers and nearest relations were soon comforted for them, and they were forgotten, as if no more criminal than other men: so that their wickedness came to an end, as a tree that grows undisturbed, and is not cut down, but decays and is broken through length of time.

He is swift as the waters. (18) Or 'on the waters.' Some understand this as a description of pirates, who, sailing over the waters in light and swift vessels, grew rich by plunder; and despised, as mean and vile, the drudgery of cultivating the earth, and the profit acquired by it.

V. 21-25. According to the observation, which Job had made on human affairs, many escaped in this world, who had injured the childless and the widow.—Others, having become powerful by iniquity, were able to prevail even against the mighty; so that none could stand before them, or be secure even as to their lives, when they arose to plunder or murder: or they formed connexions with other powerful tyrants, for the purpose of oppression. Indeed, men often purchased their favour and protection; and, confiding in their promises, thought themselves safe: but these oppressors allowed them only a transient respite, and watched for every pretence or opportunity to injure them. Thus they had their season of exaltation: and then, (as all must die,) they were gone, and brought low, and removed in an advanced age, and with as much ease as other men.—Job, having stated these undeniable facts, challenged his friends or any other persons, to prove them false or inapplicable; or to refute his doctrine, 'that calamities are no proof of wickedness.'

He evil entreateth, &c. (21) The Heb. word נִקְרָא does not signify evil entreateth, in its general use, being the yet their cries enter into "the ears of the LORD of hosts," who is their Patron; and who will at length shew before the whole world, that it is most dangerous to injure those, who are least able to defend themselves. But, "because" sentence against an evil work, is not executed speedily; "the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do" "evil." God does not immediately impute folly to them; and therefore they proceed, and encourage one another; and the earth continues full of violence and misery in multiplied and varied forms.

V. 13-25.

The workers of iniquity, however in other respects distinguished, universally "rebel against the light." If they did no violence to their own conscience, and to the common reason of mankind, there would be no need for them to bestow so much pains to conceal or palliate their crimes. But after all the efforts of infidels and profligates, their practices continue shameful, and court darkness; they hate the light of day, as well as the word of God, even when not exposed to the sword of the magistrate: and their fear of detection is an earnest of future conviction and punishment.—The murderer, the adulterer, and the robber, (characters associated in Scripture,) may enjoy their accursed portion, escape punishment from man, and live long, and go down quietly into the grave; and they may be ready to conclude, that "no harm shall happen to them." But "after death is the judgment:" and then they shall find that, while they abused the patience of God, and hardened themselves in impenitency, they "were treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who shall render to every man according to his works." "Then will they return and discern, between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not." (Notes, Mal. iii. 13-18. Rom. ii. 4-6.) And where is he, who can disprove these doctrines, or deny that they are of infinite importance? Let us then be thankful, if we have been kept from crimes so atrocious and ruinous; and let us be as assiduous in seeking the salvation of our souls, and in doing good, as sinners are in doing evil; remembering the apostle's admonition: "Ye have need of patience; that, having done the will of God, ye may receive the promise." (Heb. x. 36.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1-6. The appeal to undeniable facts, which Job had made, seems to have reduced his opponents to great difficulties. They were not convinced of their Benoni part. from לֶחֶם to feed, which sometimes means to devour. "He devoureth the barren, that he should not bear." Oppression discourages marriage, and prevents exceedingly the increase of the human species: as also does licentiousness, and the methods which the licentious take to prevent detection, which some think may be intimated.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-12.

The Lord knows the proper times for delivering his people, and for executing vengeance on his enemies; and he orders every thing in perfect wisdom, justice, goodness, and truth. Yet, to the wisest and best of men, the conduct of his providence appears involved in perplexity; but the approaching day of judgment will throw full light on all his ways and works. In the prospect of that solemn season, we should neither be stumbled and distressed at witnessing the prosperity of the wicked, nor discouraged if we share the troubles of the righteous.—The history of all ages and nations proclaims the desperate wickedness of the human heart. So far from "loving their neighbour as themselves," men, if not powerfully restrained, are induced by selfishness and idolatrous love of worldly objects, not only to withhold from others the comforts of life, but to deprive them, by fraud or violence, even of what is necessary, and to reduce them to abject misery. When this selfish and destructive principle has surmounted the fear of human justice, or climbed into a throne, iniquity is committed with a high hand, or even prescribed by law. At other times it operates by rapine or fraud: and in all cases it dictates manifold violations of justice, truth, and mercy to man, as well as a disregard of the duties which we owe to God. But who can express the crimes that have been committed, or the miseries which have been occasioned, by this inordinate self-love! Men, more savage than tigers, have in all ages and countries been disposed to prey on the helpless part of their own species; and to plunder, oppress, enslave, or murder them, as it might best suit their purposes, or as they were able to conceal or to defend what they had done; or, by their brutal lusts, to reduce individuals and families perhaps to still deeper and more exquisite misery. And though the groans of the poor, the naked, and the perishing; of the fatherless, the widow, the defrauded labourer; of those who are enslaved, dragged or driven from their native shores, and cruelly tormented by human avarice, ambition, malice, and sensuality, do not seem to interrupt the indulgence of their haughty licentious oppressors; error; but they could not answer his arguments. Bildad, therefore, spoke but few words in reply; Zophar did not answer the third time; and Eliphaz declined leading on another attack. Bildad, however, thought that Job had spoken without a proper reverence of God, or a due sense of his own meanness and sinfulness. He reminded him, therefore, that the sovereign authority over all creatures belonged solely to the Lord; and that all ought to reverence his Majesty, and to fear his omnipotent displeasure. All the inhabitants of heaven, in perfect unity and harmony, obeyed him: his innumerable creatures, marshalled in exact order, were observant of his commands and entirely under his controul: and, as the light of his sun pervaded all the earth, so all that partook of his goodness, ought to submit to his authority. But, if the heavenly bodies were obscure when compared with his infinite glory, and in his view of them; how could sinful man abide the severity of his judgment, or be approved holy in his sight? Perhaps Bildad intimated that his very birth, amidst the sorrows and pains of his mother, proved him born in sin, and a fallen creature. And, as he was so mean a worm, and so vile at his best estate, he surely ought not to contend with God, or exalt himself above him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is better for Christians to avoid controversy, or to put an end to it, when they do not speedily come to an agreement; and to converse on such subjects, as all allow to be true and important.—The pious, however distinguished, agree that the wicked may flourish for a time, but shall be rooted out at the last: they should therefore be careful not to quarrel with each other, not to envy the wicked, and not to faint in tribulation.—If we were duly influenced by the reverential fear of God, we should submit to his sovereignty, do his will, seek his glory, and rejoice in his favour, in peace and harmony, and without murmuring and disputing; even as the angels in heaven do. Indeed, his innumerable armies, yea, all his creatures, except fallen angels and men, are, in their several ways, subject to his command. All things living partake of his bounty: ought we not then to bear deserved correction patiently, and use his gifts to his glory? And ought we not to imitate his kindness to “the unthankful and the evil?”—It is very important, that we should be convinced, that we are mean, guilty, and polluted creatures before him: and the most important question which can possibly be asked, though often least attended to, is this, “How can man be justified with God? or how shall he be pure, who is born of a woman?” (Notes, ix. 1—3. xv. 14—16.) But the most atrocious sinners, when humbled before God, and disposed to accept of his salvation, may be “justified by faith,” made holy by divine grace, and exalted to glory in heaven; where the sun and moon will no longer shine, but “the LORD himself will be our everlasting light.” (Notes, Rev. xxi. 22—27. xxii. 2—5.)—Our vileness will thus commend his condescension and love; and the riches of his mercy, and the power of his grace, will be magnified in every redeemed sinner, to all eternity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1—4. Bildad had brought no argument tending to refute Job's doctrine; and therefore Job ironically admired the assistance, which Bildad had given to his friends in their extremity, and the instruction which he had afforded him in his perplexity. His friends had expected much help from him to their drooping cause; Job himself had hoped for some important counsel in his difficulties; and all had supposed that he would abundantly clear up the controversy, and fully shew how the matter really stood. But indeed he had spoken so little, and that little was so foreign to the business, that they were no stronger, nor he any wiser; and all parties were just where they had been. Surely, Bildad could not mean to utter words to him, as if he needed such counsel! Surely, he did not suppose his words to be the dictates of the Spirit of prophecy, or even the language of faith and grace; when it was evident, that he spake in his own spirit!—Some expositors, indeed, give another turn to the passage; and suppose that Job meant to deride Bildad's speech, as implying that the almighty and infinitely wise God needed such an advocate and counsellor! It is evident, however, that Job spoke with peevishness and self-preference; but it is surprising, that such a sufferer should have spirits for banter and ridicule.

Plentifully declared, &c. (3) Or, “Abundantly made known wisdom.”

CHAP. XXVII.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most important truths may be introduced unseasonably; and be so misstated and misapplied, as to deceive instead of convincing, and to distress instead of encouraging. We ought therefore to consider not only what is true and good, but what may be suitable and useful: we should advert to the person whom we address, and his situation and frame of mind: we should have some special intention in speaking; as to awaken a careless sinner or comfort a wounded conscience, to establish important truth or refute dangerous error: and we should select our subjects, and handle them with a view to this intention; otherwise we may be derided for speaking impertinently, when we have advanced doctrines, which, in other circumstances, would be worthy of great regard.—But disputants are in great danger of aiming at victory more than improvement: this produces mutual contempt and reciprocal boastings and revilings; and what seems to one party pregnant with instruction, decisive, and “fully declaring the thing as it is,” is often treated with ridicule by the other. It is well, however, when all parties agree to celebrate the praises of the LORD, and to extol his works: yet the effusions of passion, or ostentation, may be mistaken for the dictates of those holy affections, which come from the Spirit of God.—But wherever we turn our eyes, we may perceive the power, the wisdom, and the goodness of God. The earth and its wonderful revolutions and productions; the ocean under the divine controul, with all its monstrous and numerous inhabitants; the operations of nature, in the formation of the rains and dews; the dispensations of Providence, in governing the haughty tyrants of the earth, and in restraining the rage of Satan; the effects of God’s indignation, in earthquakes, hurricanes, and storms; and his authority over heaven, earth, and hell:—these are indeed a part of his wonderful works, but infinitely more is hidden from our view; nor could we hear, understand, or support, the thunder of his power, or the terrors of his law. (Notes, Ex. xx. 18—25. Heb. xii. 18—21.)—But in redemption all the other wonderful works of God are eclipsed: hither we may draw near, and hear of his glory without dismay; we may come and taste of his grace, and learn to love him and walk with delight in his ways: here we may contemplate the divine character to advantage; and adore the depths which we cannot comprehend, with the joyful expectation of at length “seeing him as he is,” and being for ever like him in purity and felicity.

may be rendered giants, or monsters. Enormous creatures are produced under the waters, among the numberless inhabitants of the deep, by the mighty power of God. Neither the bodies, which all over the earth are laid in the grave, nor the departed souls of men in their separate state, are concealed from his all-seeing eye; and even the place of punishment allotted to the wicked is under his inspection: the heavens are stretched out by him over the vast expanse of this northern hemisphere; and the earth is so wonderfully suspended in the pure space, that it needs no support: for this seems to have been known to some persons at this early period. Immense quantities of water are treasured up in the atmosphere; and are so confined in the clouds, as not to rush down impetuously, but gradually, as it is necessary for watering the earth. The throne of God in the heavens is hid by interposing clouds, being too dazzling for frail mortals to behold. He confines the raging ocean within its appointed bounds: nor will it ever break forth to cover the earth, while day and night endure. The mountains, (which appear as “the pillars of heaven,”) yea the heavens themselves, are astonished and tremble, when the Lord speaks in his wrath. He powerfully raises such storms in the ocean, as divide it into ridges of mountains; and he knows how to abase the proudest and stoutest of his enemies.—Some think that the dividing of the Red Sea, and the destruction of Egypt, or Rahab, (so the word is,) are here alluded to: but as there is no other reference to those events, as this is ambiguous, and as probably Job lived before that time; it probably refers to the general operations of the power of God.—Finally, by his creating Spirit, he has adorned the heavens with glorious luminaries, and replenished the worlds above with holy angels: and every formidable monster on the earth, and in the waters, as dreadful serpents, crocodiles, and whales, are his workmanship, and under his controul. Yea, the devil, who is subtle and poisonous, and of whom the serpent is the constant emblem, was originally the creature of God, and is still absolutely under his power. (Notes, Gen. iii. 1. Is. xxvii. 1. Rev. xii. 7—12.)

V. 14. Job here declared his subject to be inexhaustible. Men might discourse long on such things; yet a very little part of the works of God had come to their knowledge. And should God himself speak of his own power, in a manner becoming the subject; it must be in a voice like thunder, which, instead of instructing, would confound and dismay sinful man. (Note, xxxviii. 1.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1. Perhaps Job had paused, to hear whether Zophar or his other friends would rejoin. But either they were unable to answer him, or they despaired of convincing him: so that at length they suffered him to speak without interruption; and he proceeded in a grave and instructive manner, and as one fully satisfied that he had truth on his side.

V. 2—6. Job solemnly protested, that, as sure as God lived, he had spoken and would speak the truth. But he was far from being impressed with due reverence, when he spoke of God, as “taking away his judgment, and vexing his soul.” He meant that God, having inflicted on him the heaviest calamities, left him exposed to the unjust charge of hypocrisy, and delayed to vindicate his character, which exceedingly embittered his soul. His language, however, was very exceptionable, and Elihu justly rebuked him for it. (Note, xxxiv. 5—9.) Job expected soon to be deprived of the spirit, or breath, which God had given him; and he most solemnly protested that, to the last, he would not speak falsehood, either in condemning or in excusing himself: he would by no means justify the censures of his accusers, by allowing himself to be a hypocrite; nor would he give up his integrity, or the confidence and comfort of it: his heart should not reproach him with bearing false witness against himself, or for any allowed wickedness; for this conscious integrity, and his hope in God as to another world, were all that he now had to support him. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 21—28. Acts xxiv. 10—21. 2 Cor. i. 12—14. 1 John iii. 18—24.)

V. 7—10. It had been supposed, that Job counted the wicked happy, because he contended that they were sometimes prosperous; but he declared, that he could not devise a worse wish for his greatest enemy, who rose up to ruin his character, seize on his property, reduce him to slavery, or murder him, than that he might have his lot with wicked men. Indeed, those who hypocritically professed to be religious, (as his friends imagined he had done,) might perhaps thus obtain many temporal advantages, and retain them during life: but what would this avail them, when God required their souls? (Note, Luke xii. 15—21.) Would he, in that or other seasons of anguish and trouble, hear the cries of those who had been dissemblers all their lives? As they had no delight in the favour and service of the Almighty, they would not call upon him at all times. In publick, “to be seen of men,” they would make long prayers, but not in secret: in distress perhaps they would cry for ease; but, being relieved, they would cease to pray. Their best was but a pang of devotion of no continuance; and therefore God would at last reject them, as workers of iniquity.

V. 11, 12. By the powerful teaching of God, Job purposed to explain this subject to his friends; nor would he conceal any thing, which he looked upon as a part of the truth. He thought even they must acknowledge, that the wicked sometimes prosper, even to the end of life, of which they had all seen many instances. Why then did they answer so vainly? Did they take a pleasure in misinterpreting, contradicting, and condemning his discourse?

V. 13—23. Job may be thought in these verses to have come over to the opinion of his opponents: but in fact he conceded all which he could, to obviate misconception, and to establish his own conclusions. He allowed that wicked tyrants and oppressors were often visited with heavy judgments, on themselves or their families, so that these might be called “their portion from God;” yet not so constantly and uniformly, as to be a rule of judgment for deciding on men’s characters: this he had undeniably disproved, and it was all that he contended against. numerous and prosperous families were often strangely impoverished and destroyed, while none were left to bury them, or weep over them; or they were hurried to the grave, and forgotten because abhorred. They often laboured to get estates, which eventually came into the possession of better men, who did much good with them. (Notes, Esth. viii. 1, 2. Prov. xiii. 22. xxviii. 8.) The establishment of their families, which they had diligently promoted, was destroyed, as a moth is shaken out of a garment; or it was removed as a tent, which was fixed for a temporary shelter to those, who guarded the vineyards or gardens: and if they escaped such calamities, they soon lay down in death; and of all their riches, had not so much as the vain distinction, of being gathered to their fathers by an honourable funeral: nor were they gathered among the righteous; but opened their eyes in hell, far from all their treasures and employments. The expectation of this doom overwhelmed them with terrors as an inundation, and unexpected calamities swept them away, as men are plundered or murdered in the night. In short, the wrath of God, like a furious tempest, hurled them out of their places on earth, and cast misery upon them, and did not spare: while they found it impossible to escape his dreaded and deserved vengeance; and those, whom they had oppressed, rejoiced at their death and detested their memory.—The chief difference between this passage, and the discourses of Job's friends on the same subject, is this:—they spoke of the misery of wicked men before and at their death, as uniformly proportioned to their crimes: Job intimated that it might be so; but if not, the consequence of their death would assuredly be dreadful.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We may safely make our appeal to God, when we are conscious of integrity before him, and are fairly called to it: but we are so apt to mix corrupt passions with our best services, to mistake delays for denials, and corrections for vexations, and to speak irreverently or impatiently when afflicted; that, without continual applications of the blood of sprinkling, we cannot possibly have any well grounded confidence before God.—As we ought not, without scrip-

CHAP. XXVIII.

Job shews that man is industrious and ingenious, in searching out the treasures hid in the earth, 1—11. But the more valuable treasure, of the knowledge of God, lies beyond his reach, 12—22. God alone comprehends it; and man's wisdom is to fear God, and depart from evil, 23—28.

tural evidence, to conclude that we are in the way of salvation, so we should not be induced to condemn ourselves as hypocrites, if conscious that we trust in his mercy, and aim to do his will; nor should we justify those who censoriously condemn their brethren. A good conscience on evangelical principles, and a watchful opposition to sin, will prevent our own hearts from reproaching us, and inspire confidence in God, in the midst of afflictions and calumnies, and in the hour of death: and this we should hold fast as long as we live.—No greater misery can be imprecated, than the doom of the most prosperous sinner; no more dreadful case imagined, than that of the successful, specious hypocrite. He may indeed call on God, when frightened or distressed; but he will soon desist in weariness or despondency, and seek some other relief. But the humble penitent will knock at mercy's door, till it is opened, and not be induced by any delay to depart without a blessing; and he who delights in God, will always call upon him, in adversity and prosperity, in life and death.—If we would teach others, we must depend on the help of the Almighty, and not conceal his truth: and if we would convince the erroneous, we must guard against misconstructions, and carefully shew, in how many things we are agreed. In this, at least, all good men are of one judgment: that the wicked may be, and often are, grievously afflicted upon earth with outward calamities; that they must be subject to inward terrors and vexations; and that, even if they prosper till death, and die in outward peace, they will then be driven from riches, pleasures, and honourable stations, into eternal poverty, misery, and contempt, by the wrath of God, like a furious storm hurling them into destruction. In vain will they seek to flee out of his hand, while “he shall cast upon them, and not spare,” the punishments justly due to their crimes. “What, then, is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? And what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?”

such principles as his friends contended for; but by a higher and incomprehensible wisdom: and to illustrate and confirm this, he here shewed, that the sagacity of men was chiefly competent for natural things, and employed in them; it could not therefore be supposed they were acquainted with the deep counsels of God. The all-wise Creator has treasured up the metals in the earth; but man's necessity, convenience, or avarice, prompts him to search for them. There he finds the ores of gold, silver, iron, and brass, mixed with other substances, and resembling stones: and he discovers ways of separating and refining them by fire. With their lamps, the miners, "put an end to the "darkness" of the subterraneous caverns, and search out all the valuable treasures contained in them; even those "stones of darkness," which are situated in such perilous and unwholesome places, as may be called "the shadow of "death." Here "floods break out upon the inhabitants" of these dreary regions; being those waters, which had sunk into the earth, from the foot of man, and formed subterraneous springs and streams: and the miners are forced, with great labour and danger, to make new channels, that the waters may run away from them. As, by the labour of man, corn and other things suited for his food grow upon the surface of the earth: so precious stones, sparkling like fire; or inflammable substances, as brimstone or coals, are dug out of it. Among the stones of the earth are sapphires, as well as the ore of gold. In pursuit of these treasures men travel under-ground, by a road which is unknown to the swiftest and most quick-sighted animals. By their persevering labour and contrivance, they undermine and overturn rocks and mountains; they cut rivers and form banks under ground; while they seek out, and bring forth, every hidden valuable treasure there repositied.—This book is beyond all reasonable doubt, one of the most ancient in the world; yet the art of mining, and refining metals, and the use of precious stones, are spoken of as things well known in the east, where Job and his friends dwelt. But very many ages after, populous nations have been found, which were little acquainted with these things: the iron especially, (which is in fact the most useful of all metals,) seems to have been little known, or employed among the Greeks, in the very early ages of that nation; and it was totally unknown in America, when that continent was first discovered. So that the most ancient times appear to have been far more civilized, and acquainted with things useful, than subsequent ages: and barbarous ignorance seems to have prevailed gradually; as the knowledge possessed by the antediluvians, and doubtless communicated by Noah and his sons, was forgotten among their posterity. The Bible by no means favours the general notion, that the first ages of the world were the most rude and savage; nay, indeed, the accounts there given are totally inconsistent with it.

V. 12—19. Job here maintained, that "wisdom," (or the knowledge of God, and his works and ways, which led to a prudent and holy practice, and might enable men to unravel the mysteries of Providence,) was far more difficult to be found, than the subterraneous treasures before spoken of. Indeed, men in general knew neither where it might be obtained, nor its inestimable value. It was not to be met with among the inhabitants of the earth, except as it came down from above. (Notes, Prov. ii. 1—7. Jam. i. 5—8. 16—18. iii. 13—18.) It could not be discovered, either by digging into the bowels of the earth, or diving into the bottom of the sea, or sailing to all parts of the world. By these means indeed, gold, silver, and all kinds of precious stones might be procured; but none of them, nor all of them together, could purchase wisdom.—Several different words are used in the original for gold; which are supposed to denote, either the place from which it came, the manner in which it had been purified, or the form in which it was offered to sale, whether wrought or unwrought. The words also, rendered “crystal,” “onyx,” “sapphire,” &c. are differently interpreted.

V. 20—22. As no wealth could purchase wisdom, so no creature could discover it. It was hid from the eyes of all living. Men of the greatest talents, who soared above the rest of mankind, as the fowls of the air above other creatures, could not, by all their speculations and discoveries, acquire wisdom. “Destruction and death,” indeed, brought reports of it: and if men deeply thought on these solemn subjects, they might understand something of the reasons, for which the wicked were permitted to prosper; and the event would at length clear up difficulties, and effectually shew what was man’s wisdom. But previous and more particular instruction was necessary to make men truly wise.—‘The grave is the only place where we may learn something of it.’ Bp. Patrick.—Surely nothing can be learned in the grave; and hell rather than the grave must be meant by the word (אֲבִיּוֹן) translated “destruction.” (Note, Rev. ix. 11.)

V. 23—28. All the preceding observations and enquiries were evidently intended as introductory to these closing instructions; in which Job shewed, that God alone was the Source and Giver of wisdom. He knew where it was laid up, and the way in which it might be found. He managed the whole creation in perfect wisdom; determining the force and direction of every wind, and the quantity of water to be formed into rains and dews; regulating the course of the clouds, and directing the thunder and lightning. At the creation, he had his whole plan before him, and declared unto man, as much as was good for him to know: and he had prepared the whole of his intended operations, as accurately, as if they had been searched out by intense study.—This implied, that as men could neither alter nor comprehend these works of God; they were equally unable to discover the methods of his providence. God had from the beginning plainly declared to man, that his wisdom consisted not in the knowledge of the secrets of nature, or of the divine government, but in “fearing the LORD and departing from evil.” (Notes, Gen. xxii. 11, 12. Deut. xxix. 29. Ec. xii. 11—14.)—Thus Job intimated to the disputants, that they might shew their wisdom much more, by a conscientious performance of their own duty, than by presumptuously intruding into the secret reasons of the divine dispensations; or rashly condemning their afflicted friend as a hypocrite.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—11.

The riches of this world are sought with unwearied labour and extreme danger: the faculties of the soul and the vigour of the body are alike devoted to the pursuit; and, from age to age, men sacrifice their ease, ruin their health, and venture their lives, to acquire them! Indeed, they are good in themselves, and for the uses to which they were appointed: and the bountiful kindness of the Creator appears, in covering the surface, and storing the bowels, of the earth with so many useful productions: nor should the ingenuity or industry which men employ about them be condemned, except as disproportionate. (Note, Gen. i. 20—25.) Neither silver nor gold, but the love of them, “is the root of all evil:” and the avarice, pride, and luxury of the human heart, not the creatures which God hath made for our use, ought to bear the whole blame of the mischiefs, to which they merely give occasion. It is also observable, that whilst God gives us all these things, he gives them in the way of industry; the productions of nature cannot be prepared for use, without enduring hardship for them, and often venturing into perilous situations; and, in like manner, whilst wisdom and grace are freely bestowed, we must labour and deny ourselves, and face dangers and enemies, if we would appropriate them. But did we understand the infinite value of these gifts, and our urgent want of them, we should think every hardship and sacrifice comparatively small. All earthly treasures are insufficient and precarious: they cannot give peace of conscience, health, or contentment: they cannot prolong life, or abate the fear of death, or purchase exemption from future punishment: they must be left soon, and for ever, and an account must be given to God of the use which we have made of them. But true wisdom and grace confer peace, and joy, and lively hope; they deprive death of his sting, and ensure an eternal inheritance. Who then can estimate their value? All the treasures of the world and the whole world itself, are worthless in the comparison: yet alas! every gilded bauble is preferred to them! No labour is deemed too great to employ about carnal things; yet every exertion is too much about our spiritual and eternal interests! "Go then to the miner, thou slug-gard, consider his ways, and be wise:" imitate his ingenuity, application, and intrepidity, in the affairs of thy soul: seek salvation, as he does the gold and silver ore, and thou shalt be enriched for ever. (P. O. Prov. ii. 1—9.)

V. 12—28.

Where is true wisdom to be found? In the heart of the earth? In the depth of the sea? Or in the schools of the learned? By no means: it is "the LORD that giveth wisdom." The treasures of it are "hid in Christ," revealed by the word of truth, and received by faith, through the operation of the Holy Spirit. There the Lord has prepared and declared it: there we may search for it and discover it. But it does not consist, in explaining all mysteries, settling all controversies, or solving all difficulties in the phenomena of nature, or in the divine government. It is not intended to feed our pride and vanity, to amuse our curiosity, or to embolden our presumption; but to teach us where and what we are, and whither we are going; to shew us our wants, and where they may be supplied. It instructs and encourages us sinners to "fear the LORD, and to depart from evil," in the exercise of repentance and faith: and it admonishes us in faith and hope, and by patient continuance in well doing, to wait for that world, to which death will soon convey us, for fuller light respecting all the ways and works of God. Our business here is, to believe, adore, love, and obey; not to comprehend and dispute. We receive the benefit of the rain, and avail ourselves of the winds and tides, and seek shelter from the storm, whether we understand the theory of them or not. Thus let us flee from the wrath to come, take refuge in the hope of the gospel, receive the comforts of life thankfully, and bear its burdens cheerfully, without being desirous of knowing those "secret things" which belong to the LORD our God." The government of the world is his, and he neither needs nor asks our advice: but "to man he saith, The fear of the LORD, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1—6. It is probable, that when Job had finished his commendation of wisdom, he paused, to hear whether his friends had any thing to add: but as they were silent, he proceeded to contrast his former prosperity, and his honourable conduct as a magistrate, with his present abject misery; in order to excite their compassion, and to excuse his complaints, and perhaps to engage their more fixed attention to the other parts of his discourse. Indeed he could not but ardently desire that matters were so with him at the present, as formerly they had been. Then God preserved his health, his property, his family, his honour, and his peace, having "made a hedge about him." Providence smiled upon him, and he enjoyed spiritual consolations: so that he lived happily, and walked securely, in this dark and wretched world. Thus he had been favoured early in life: the secret wisdom of God had been communicated to him, and his secret blessing had rested upon him and prospered his habitation: his soul had been refreshed with the secret pleasures of communion with God, before whom he had walked as his almighty Friend; (Note, Ps. xxv. 14;) whilst his children shared and doubled his enjoyments. His cattle, fed in rich pastures, afforded such plenty of milk and butter, that he could, had he pleased, have washed his steps in it: and his olive-yards, planted upon the rocky grounds, yielded such abundance, that it was as rivers of oil.—But he intimated that God had now withdrawn his protection, and the light of his consolations; excluded him from communion with him, and bereaved him of his wealth and children, his health and peace, and reputation.

wild beast is disabled when its "jaw-teeth are broken;" and he constrained them to make restitution, as when "the prey is plucked out of their mouths." (Notes, Ps. lxxxii. 2—4. Prov. xxxi. 8, 9.)

V. 18—25. Thus respected, useful, and conscientious, and considering the whole as coming from the favour of God, Job had hoped to live long in prosperity, and to die in peace and honour in a good old age: for he seemed like a tree which had struck deep root in a well watered soil, and was refreshed every night by the kindly dew. Heaven and earth seemed to favour him continually. (Note, Ps. xxx. 6—8.) He had done nothing to impair his reputation or influence, or to prevent their increase. His counsel was silently attended to, and his decisions were waited for with great expectation, and were refreshing as the seasonable rain. His smile was counted a very great favour: and if he relaxed from his usual gravity, and shewed himself more affable with the people, they did not abate in their respect, or undervalue his kindness. Still they allowed him to counsel and command in all their affairs, as a king, with uncontrouled authority, rules over his troops: yet, amidst all, he never lost sight of the beneficent employment of comforting the mourners.—Some read all the latter verses in the present tense. "My roots are, &c." as, Job's recollection of his inward thoughts, during his prosperous days, when anticipating the continuance of them, in which he had been so grievously disappointed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The Lord protects and prospers us as he pleases; and he confers on those who love him whatever can be beneficial to them. Yet riches and flourishing families, though a "candle of the LORD," may be soon and finally extinguished: they do but little towards illuminating our way through this dark world, and nothing towards cheering the and authority, and was become chief ruler over the neighbouring tribes; probably through his reputation for wisdom and justice, as well as on account of his affluence. So that when he went through the city to the gate, where his throne for administering justice was prepared, the young men stood so much in awe of him, and so feared his reprehension for their irregularities, that they kept out of the way; the aged rose in respect of his character; and the nobles and princes were silent, as if bereft of speech, that they might attend to his arguments and decisions, and be instructed by them; and, indeed, all who saw and heard him applauded his impartial justice, and bare testimony to his wisdom and discretion.

V. 12—17. 'Because Job's adversaries did so much charge him with wickedness, he is compelled to render account of his life.' And as no one attempted to disprove his attestations, no doubt he spoke what was undeniably true: indeed God himself, at the close, as it were, attested the truth of it.—He could confidently protest, that it was his constant object to redress the grievances of the orphans and destitute, who demanded justice against their powerful oppressors: so that widows and other persons, who were about to be crushed, murdered, or starved, thanked him and prayed for him as their patron, with joyful hearts. He never appeared in publick, but with an evident determination to do justice: the equity of his conduct was to him the robe, or the badge of his authority, and he deemed it more his honour, than any royal diadem. By counselling the ignorant how to manage their affairs, he became as "eyes to the blind;" by supporting the helpless with his power and authority, he was as "feet to the lame:" he was the general guardian and father to all poor people; and neither spared pains and expense, nor feared opposition, in searching out their causes, and rescuing them from oppression. Thus he deprived rich oppressors of their power to do mischief, as effectually, as a vale of death. But when the mind is enlightened by the Holy Spirit; when a man walks in the light of God's comforting presence, and enjoys the secret pleasure of communion with him; every outward comfort is doubled, every trouble is diminished, and he may pass cheerfully, by this light, through life and death to heaven. The sensible comfort, however, of this happy state is often withdrawn from those who have enjoyed it; and they regret the months and days which they have formerly known, and long for their return. (Note, Ps. xlii. 4, 5.) In general, this change arises from negligence and "grieving the Holy Spirit;" but sometimes it may be a trial of a man's faith and grace. Yet it is always right in such cases to examine ourselves, to enquire into the cause by fervent prayer, and to redouble diligence and watchfulness.—Many, however, who profess that they have walked in this heavenly light, complain that now it is not with them "as in months past," and rest satisfied with unavailing lamentations! Depending on past experience, and concluding their state safe, they put up at present with worldly comforts, and are as negligent as they are joyless. And others, who have really walked with God, finding their comforts decline, are tempted to think all their past experience a delusion, and to conclude that the Almighty has finally forsaken them. But for those comforts, which are indeed from God, the true believer can find no substitute in the whole creation: and, though they may be withdrawn, they shall never be extinguished, but shall be restored, and endure till lost in the blaze of heavenly glory.

V. 7—23.

Years, rank, and authority, if connected with eminent justice, wisdom, and piety, confer peculiar dignity and influence: they over-awe the careless and lawless; command the respect of inferiors and equals; and procure a deference even from superiors. When a man's judgment and integrity have thus obtained him an established reputation, his opinions are readily approved, and his measures adopted. Then it is peculiarly happy for him and others, if he is preserved humble, zealous for the honour of God, and ambitious only of doing good: if he value the blessing of the needy and afflicted, and the testimony of men's consciences to his equity and humanity, as his robe, his diadem, and his recompence: if he continue a stranger to fear, favour, and affection, to covetousness and self-indulgence; and resolutely act as the patron of the poor, the widow, the orphan, and the oppressed; desiring that their hearts may rejoice, and that their prayers for their benefactor may be united with many thanksgivings unto God: if, by the use of his wealth, authority, and wisdom, he be as "eyes to the blind, and "feet to the lame;" a father to the poor, and a terror and restraint to wealthy oppressors, and spare no labour for the effecting these valuable purposes. Such persons are publick blessings, their protection is courted, and their friendship valued, by all good men; though their excellency be hated, and their power dreaded, by the tyrants whose jaws they break, and whom they spoil of their prey. They prevent much mischief, make many disconsolate mourners joyful, and are an ornament to religion. And they have the peculiar honour to resemble him, who hath "put on righteousness as a robe, and is clad with zeal "as a cloke;" who rescues enslaved sinners from the power of Satan, and breaks the jaws of that devourer; who, in a far nobler sense, "is eyes to the blind, and feet to the "lame, and a Father to the poor;" whose words are all in wisdom, truth, and love, and his favour more refreshing than the latter rain; whose smile is so great a blessing to the desponding soul that waited for it, that he can hardly believe his own experience, when the Saviour manifests his love; and he will adore and revere him still more and more for his unspeakable condescension. How many, who were ready to perish, are now blessing him! How many mourners has he comforted! But who can shew forth all his praises? May we trust his mercy, and copy his equity, truth, and love!—Let us not however flatter ourselves with the expectation of continued honour and prosperity in this world. In the midst of all we should think of dying ere long; and even before death, of being deprived of all our outward comforts; though there should be every appearance, that life and prosperity will be continued to us. Storms will succeed to calms, and calms to storms, in this changeable world; but in heaven will be uninterrupted and unchangeable felicity. Let us then look to our Captain and King: he has chosen out our way, and has been chief in sorrows, as well as in honours: and as he comforts his mourning followers; so he has shewn the whole army of his saints the way to victory and glory, through tribulation, sufferings, and death; and has said, "If any man will come after me, let him deny "himself, and take up his cross, and follow me;" and, "Where I am, there shall my servant be."

7—11,) treated him with the greatest contempt: nay the children of the most abject persons imaginable insulted him, whom he described as the vilest outcasts of society. These objects were so destitute of fidelity and honesty, so lazy and ignorant, that they were not capable of doing so much good as the dogs of his flock; and he would have disdained to employ them in the meanest services about his cattle. Their lives, wasted in wickedness, had left them debilitated and ignorant, debauched and infamous, in old age; and, being burdens and nuisances by their crimes, they were expelled from society in a most miserable manner. Incapable of obtaining an honest livelihood, and afraid of being punished for their past offences, they had fled into the most desolate parts of the wilderness; and there miserably subsisted upon roots and herbs not fitted to sustain the life of man. For they were driven away as thieves, and concealed themselves in dens and caves from the search of pursuers; or among the weeds and bushes, where they grew savage like the wild asses. Such worthless wretches, of whom Job's active magistracy had rid the country, returned with their families when he was reduced: and, though their ignorant and profligate parents had neglected to give their children any good instructions; yet they had learned to make songs and jests about Job, and to shew their contempt and abhorrence, by affecting to shun him as a loathsome object, or drawing near him to spit in his face. (Marg. Ref. m—o.) It may be supposed, that these were the expressions of their resentment for his former opposition to their villainy; and of their joy that his authority was terminated. Because the Lord had loosed his cord, by depriving him of power and affluence, they behaved with unbridled insolence, and attempted to injure him by every means which they could devise. It is likely that they accused Job of oppression, because he had punished them for their crimes; and thus they endeavoured to "fortify against him the ways of their destruction," or to secure themselves from punishment in their abandoned courses. By these methods they marred, or vilified, his path, and helped forward his calamity, exciting his friends to treat him as a hypocrite: and "no helper unto them;" that is, they had no need of help from Job's former friends, being already sufficiently daring and ingenious in their malice. For they came upon him as a torrent of waters, which bursts the banks, and rolls on with rapid desolation. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 5, 6. Ps. xxii. 4—8. lxix. 1—4. 10—12.)

V. 15—19. Job again complained of terrors, which doubtless arose, in great measure, from Satan's temptations. (Notes, vi. 1—4. vii. 13, 14. Ps. lxxxviii. 15—17.) These agitated and pursued his soul like a tempest, and drove all his comfort away as a cloud vanisheth: so that all his courage and resolution were destroyed, and his very soul poured out as if melted by the fire. (Marg. Ref. z.) For affliction had so seized upon him that he was unable to escape. His bones and sinews also were in such incessant anguish, that they seemed to be pierced with a sword, and he could have no rest. His sores defiled his garments, and so confined him that he could not move without extreme pain. He was as disgusting to the sight, through the calamity which God had inflicted, as if he had been rolled in the mire: yea, he was become like dust and ashes, before he was laid in the grave. (Notes, ii. 7, 8. xix. 5—22. Ps. xxxviii. 1—10.)

could obtain no answer to his prayers; and though he stood up to appeal to God, respecting his injured character, he was disregarded. He therefore rashly concluded that the Lord was become rigorous to him, even to a degree of cruelty; and used his power expressly to oppose and distress him: so that he, as it were, lifted him up into the air, to be the sport of conflicting winds, and to be driven from one misery to another; and his whole body was dissolving with excessive heat and debility, as if by the fire of the divine indignation; nay, he thought he might be sure, that God intended to pursue him to the grave with these extreme miseries. (Notes, Ps. xxii. 14, 15.) But in that "house appointed for all living," he hoped to be at ease, and that the Lord would not stretch out his hand against him in, or beyond, the grave: though some would interpret his miserable death, as a token of his final destruction; and exult over him, upon the supposition that he was thus proved to be a wicked man: while others, by loud wailings, would perhaps deplore his deliverance from pain, as if it were destruction.

V. 25-31. These events were the more overwhelming to Job, because they were so contrary to his expectation. He was conscious, however, and could appeal to God, that he had always sympathized with the afflicted, and relieved the poor, and never oppressed them: and on this ground he had hoped for much comfort, at the very time when these dark and dreadful trials came upon him. This astonishing change so affected him, that he spent his time in mourning, as one immured from the light of the sun: nor could he help crying out in the bitterness of his soul, even in the midst of those who condemned him. He was no longer fit for the society of men; but he was driven into solitude, or caused to associate with noxious and ominous creatures, like dragons or owls, as if they were his relatives and his friends. His skin was become black by the effect of his boils; his bones were burned with a fever; and his joyful praises, which he used to accompany with the harp or timbrel, were turned into doleful lamentations.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14.

All earthly honour, prosperity, and comfort are precarious: and 'they build too low, who build beneath the 'skies.' But if a contrast, so affecting as this narrative exhibits, may be drawn, between the summit of earthly felicity, and the depth of earthly misery; how inconceivable must be the distance between eternal life and eternal punishment! And if the thoughts of former enjoyments greatly enhance the anguish of present sufferings; in what a wretched case will the wealthy, honoured, and self-indulgent sinner be, when it shall be said to him, "Remember that thou in thy life-time receivedst thy good things!" (Notes, Luke xvi. 22-26.)—The vicious and debauched, who live in sloth and riot by fraud and rapine, hate those who attempt to make them labour and live honestly, or punish them for their crimes.—A few individuals prosper by iniquity, and live in splendour; but multitudes are by their vices reduced to the most extreme misery. They forfeit their characters, as well as ruin their circumstances and constitutions; every one suspects them, and becomes averse to employ them; their lives are wasted in brutality, fraud, and extravagance; and for the peace of society, they must be confined, destroyed, or driven away, like ravenous beasts. In distant regions, or desolate places, they drag on a miserable existence, without the comforts, and often almost without the necessities of life. Their folly and their wickedness are alike great: their present condition and future prospects are both deplorable. A Christian, indeed, must not disdain nor despair of any fellow-creature, nor reproach men for their poverty, nor indulge resentment; and they who, through incapacity or the imbecility of old age, cannot work, have a right to be maintained by others: yet men may persevere in so base a conduct, that no wise man can employ, trust, or favour them; and whilst they continue in their vile practices, they are less entitled to regard, than the meanest of the inoffensive and useful brute creatures. There are numbers, who cannot, by any human wisdom or power, be preserved from present and future ruin: we may lament to see them dying with disease and in misery; but we cannot make them willing to be done good to: and in some scenes, it is equally surprising and afflicting to notice the multitudes which answer to this description. As, however, some of every sort may be rescued from ruin, it is our part to do what we can in the use of proper means; and to look to him, with whom all things are possible, for an effectual blessing.—But they, who are themselves base and foolish, train up families of children of the same character, inured to vice, and fitted to be the nuisance of society. So that, except some method be devised to prevent the rising generations, one after another, from being corrupted, no extensive reformation can take place; and alas! the sword of the magistrate will still find abundance of employment. These are they, who take the lead in reviling, insulting,

CHAP. XXXI.

Job solemnly, before God, protests, that he was not guilty of unchastity or dishonesty, 1—12; of unkindness to his servants, or to the poor, 13—22; of trusting in riches; of idolatry, revenge, neglect of hospitality, hypocrisy, or fear of man, 23—34. He appeals to God, and challenges his accusers to prove their allegations, 35—40.

and opposing the wise and pious reformer or the active magistrate: as much as they dare, and as soon as authority is at all relaxed, they give a loose to their insolence: and if such as have rebuked or chastised their crimes, fall into affliction; they shew their enmity by every kind of indignity. But, instead of regretting it, we should rejoice if we are despised, reviled, and hated, only by wicked men: and we should look “unto Jesus, who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself;” and against whom (as against Job,) the very objects were gathered together, to insult, mock, and spit upon him. (Notes, Is. l. 5, 6. liii. 2, 3. Matt. xxvi. 63—68. xxvii. 27—31. 39—44.) Considering who he was, and what we are, and how much lighter our sufferings are, than those which he endured; we may well be ashamed to complain of the insults and injuries which we experience.

V. 15—31.

When inward temptations unite with outward calamities, the soul often loses its firmness, is hurried on as in a tempest, and is filled with confusion. It then becomes difficult to speak, or complain, without seeming “to charge God foolishly,” as if he dealt too rigorously with us, and were become our Enemy. But woe be to those, who have him for an Enemy! They will not only be brought with others to the grave, but to the bottomless pit of destruction. Compared with this “perdition of ungodly men,” what are all outward, or even inward, temporal afflictions? If our whole bodies were filled with exquisite pain, and were rendered loathsome by disease; if we were shut up in a dungeon, driven from society, or thrown into the mire; if our friends were become cruel, and our enemies triumphant; if the Lord frowned, Satan tempted, and the world loaded us with infamy;—yet, while we retained a hope that death would terminate our sorrows, and bring us to a state of happiness, we might well mingle joy with our mourning, and thanksgiving with our lamentations. “No chastening, however, seemeth to be joyous, but grievous;” and unexpected afflictions are hardest to be endured. They will therefore mar our cheerfulness: but we should not yield to despondency, nor convert grounds of consolation into topicks of discouragement. If none are disposed to pity us, as we have sympathized with others, our correcting God pities us, “even as a father pitieth his own children.” But, as the grave is the house appointed for all living, let us look more to the things which are unseen and eternal. In that world, into which death will speedily remove us, the true believer, who has been the most afflicted, calumniated, and tempted, will take his golden harp, and most eyes; why then should I ^b think upon a maid?

2 For ^c what portion of God is there from above? and what inheritance of the Almighty from on high?

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1—4. Job had been accused of many crimes; and as his accusers could not prove his guilt, so it would have been difficult for him to prove his innocence: he was therefore compelled, as it were, to answer upon oath; and he solemnly appealed to God that he was not guilty of the charges, which had been brought against him. He adduced a variety of particulars, to obviate the suspicion of any secret iniquity having been committed by him: and he shewed that he acted upon principle in his whole conduct. Indeed, it appears, from this protestation, that he understood the spiritual nature of the divine commandments, as reaching to the thoughts and intents of the heart, far better, than almost any of those did, to whom the written law was delivered, and among whom it was preserved. (Notes, Rom. vii. 9—14.)—He first appealed to God, that he had avoided all unchastity, and had kept to the original institution of marriage; and that he strictly inhibited his eyes from gazing upon any woman, however beautiful, to lust after her, though she were unmarried, or his inferior. (Notes, Ex. xx. 14. Matt. v. 27, 28.) He had covenanted with them, that they should be confined to the beholding of the beauties of creation, and the examining of the works of God, and not be allowed to admit a licentious desire into his heart: and no doubt his imagination was equally forbidden to entertain the polluting thought, by which lust is conceived, and sin is produced. (Note, James i. 13—15.) For, however man might excuse these things, Job knew that God abhorred them: and if he were guilty of them, he could expect nothing from above, but destruction in another world; and perhaps some strange punishment in this life, such as befell the inhabitants of Sodom, which seems to be referred to: for God saw all his ways and marked his steps, though he might conceal them from man.—In this chapter and in the twenty-ninth, much more is contained of genuine purity and equity; of condescending, liberal, self-denying kindness to the poor and needy; of superiority to the love of the world and the fear of men, and all corrupt motives, as well as of sterling piety, than in all the writings of pagan antiquity combined. The standard of duty is fixed as high as in the moral law, and explained as spiritually as in our Saviour’s sermon on the mount. And the entire coincidence of this ancient book with the New Testament, in this essential matter, as well as in the grand doctrines of revealed religion, and the effect of them on the practice of true believers, forms a striking proof, that it was “written by inspiration from God ;” that all the sacred writers “spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost ;” and that true religion has been the same for substance in every age from the beginning.—Job’s conduct as a magistrate, in his publick capacity, was before exhibited : this chapter contains an avowal of his habitual conduct in private life.

V. 5—8. Job next solemnly protested, that he had not yielded to covetous desires. He had not dealt fraudulently, or imposed on others by vain pretences, or hastily and secretly seized unjust advantages, or turned aside from the direct path of honesty. He had not looked on his neighbour’s goods to covet them, and then devised means to obtain them : for this seems to be the meaning of the phrase, “If mine heart walked after mine eyes.” (Notes, Gen. iii. 6. Ex. xx. 17. Josh. vii. 21. 1 Kings xxi. 1, 2.) There was no blot of this kind on his hands. In this matter he desired an impartial trial, and that God would know, or make known, and approve, his integrity : but if he were guilty, he submitted to the sentence as most just ; even, if in future, all the fruits of his industry in cultivating the earth should be seized upon by others for their own use ; and if any children, or descendants, which he might hereafter have, should be cut off and extirpated, as his late flourishing family had been. (Note, v. 3—5.)

V. 9—12. Job next solemnly protested, that his heart had not been deceived, by the beauty or blandishments of another man’s wife, to entertain a sinful affection for her, or to wait for an opportunity of committing adultery with her. If he ever had attempted such a crime, he was willing that his guilt should be detected, by his own wife becoming the vilest slave, or even concubine to others. But, as he should abhor the thought of her being so wicked or so wretched, so he equally abhorred the thought of adultery : for he knew that it was not only hateful to God, but destructive to society, and deserved to be punished by the civil magistrates ; as it would consume like a fire, not only the soul of him who committed it, but every thing valuable in social and domestick life. (Note, Ex. xx. 14.)

V. 13—15. Job was not only conscious, that he was clear from the guilt of cruelly oppressing his servants ; but that he had not disdained to hearken to their cause, when they objected to his orders, or complained of his conduct towards them ; being ever ready to do them justice, and make them comfortable. He knew that before his Master in heaven, he could not vindicate any oppression of an inferior, when he should arise to visit the transgressions of sinners upon them : (Notes, Eph. vi. 5—9. Col. iv. 1 :) and he was sensible that they had a right to equity and kindness ; being equally the creatures of God, partakers of the same rational nature, and descended from the same common parents with himself.—Compare this statement, and the motives here adduced, with the conduct of the most civilized pagans towards their slaves, and the opinions of their strictest moralists on this subject ; and note the immense disparity, between natural principles, and that religion which God has revealed !

V. 16—23. Instead of having oppressed the poor, the orphan, and the widow, as it had been asserted of him, (Note, xxii. 5—14,) Job could appeal to God that he had ever been their kind friend. He had not only supplied their urgent necessities, but regarded their reasonable desires ; and had not left the poor widow to behold, with unavailing wishes, the abundance of which she might not partake. He had shared his plenty with the fatherless and the destitute : for he had been educated to such maxims and habits ; and, from his earliest youth, he had been accustomed to bring up poor orphans, and to counsel, protect, and provide for the widows. He had made clothes of his wool, for those who were destitute of proper covering, so that, being made comfortable by him, they were excited to pray for him. And if he had ever used his authority and influence to defraud the helpless orphan, he would consent that God should manifest his iniquity, by causing his arm to wither, and drop off from his shoulder-blade. But indeed he had feared a more dreadful destruction from God, in another world : and, as the mightiest princes could not endure before his holy Majesty, this fear alone was sufficient to restrain him from such iniquities.—The most of Job's servants had been killed, the rest were disobedient to him, and his cattle had been taken away from him: it was therefore a comfort to him to reflect, that he had behaved well to the one, and made a good use of the other, whilst he had them; and especially, that he had acted, in these respects, not from regard to man, but from the fear of God, and reverence to his authority. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 12—14.)—In what other ancient book, not written by an Israelite, shall we meet with sentiments so kind and considerate concerning the lower orders in society?

V. 24—28. Job had been very rich: (i. 3:) but he was conscious, that he had neither gloried, rejoiced, or confided in his wealth; nor thought himself, on that account, a wiser, better, or happier man. But, considering himself as a steward, in respect of his possessions, and expecting to account for them, he had shunned this common idolatry. He had also entirely kept himself from all gross idolatry, open or secret; he had never in the smallest instance given that honour to the sun or moon, those splendid and useful creatures, which belonged to the Creator alone. (Marg. Ref. t. Note, Deut. iv. 19.) For he knew that this was a denial of the unity, sovereignty, and exclusive right to adoration, of the God above. The words, rendered "an iniquity to be punished by the judge," have led some to think that this book was written, after the giving of the Mosaic law; but the circumstance of no idolatry, except that of the sun and moon being mentioned, is a much more probable argument in favour of a higher antiquity. The judicial law for punishing idolatry by the magistrate, seems to have been intended for Israel alone, as under the Sinai-covenant. The plural of the same word is used and rendered judges, when the punishment of adulterers is spoken of (11). Adultery is a crime, which tends to destroy the peace of society, and, as such, falls directly under the cognizance of magistrates; but idolatry is committed immediately against God: and if our translation be just, He, as the Judge of the world, seems meant, and not the civil magistrate.

An iniquity to be punished by the judge. (28) יָצַד פְּלִי Iniquitas judicata, aut judicanda; vel, judice digna. Robertson's Thesaur. But may not יָצַד פְּלִי signify my Judge, meaning God himself? Especially as Job was speaking of a supposed crime, concealed from man. (Note, Deut. xxvii. 15.)

V. 29—32. So far from hating his enemies, or revenging himself on them, Job protested that, as he valued the favour of God above, he had not allowed himself to rejoice or triumph when mischief befell them, or to wish them any harm. (Notes, Ex. xxiii. 4, 5. Prov. xxiv. 17, 18. xxv. 21, 22. Matt. v. 43—48.) Nay, when his dependents were so enraged at those who injured him, that they were ready to devour them, he would by no means permit them to follow the impulse of their vindictive rage. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4—7. xxvi. 8—12.) At the same time, in imitation of faithful Abraham, he was ever ready to entertain strangers and travellers, as circumstances required.—Bishop Hall thus paraphrases the thirty-first verse:—'If the people of my house were not so taken up with the offices of my hospitality to others, that they had no leisure to feed themselves, and therefore complained for the want of that flesh, which they dressed for others.'—The words may be literally rendered, “Who will give us of his flesh?

“we shall not be satisfied.”

V. 33, 34. So far from being a hypocrite, Job was conscious that he had not, after the example of Adam, or “the “manner of man,” attempted to conceal or justify his faults: (Notes, Gen. iii. 7—13. Hos. vi. 7 :) but he was ever open to conviction, and ready to confess his offence to God or man, as there was occasion; not fearing reproach or contempt on that account: ‘whereby it is evident ‘that he justified himself before men, and not before God.’
Nor was he ever induced, by the fear of the multitude, or the contempt of the great families around, to neglect any part of his duty as a magistrate.

V. 35—37. After this particular protestation of his integrity, Job renewed his appeal to God, desiring that he would hear and decide his cause. “Behold, my object”
(the scope and aim of all my discourse,) “is, that the Al“mighty would answer me.” Job challenged his adversary, or accuser, to produce a libel, or written indictment against him: he was confident that it would prove no disgrace to him, but an honour; as every article would be disproved and the reverse be manifested. He was ready to go through his whole life, step by step, even assisting his accuser in drawing up the charge; and prepared in every particular to justify himself from the crimes alledged against him:
and he would appear in court with the confidence of a prince who came to be crowned, not with the dejection of a criminal who dreaded condemnation.—Upon the whole, this protestation and appeal were well grounded, and honourable to Job’s character. St. Paul in different places makes similar appeals; but in a more modest and reverential manner. (Notes, 1 Cor. iv. 3—5. ix. 13—27. x. 29—33.
2 Cor. i. 12—14. vi. 3—10. vii. 2—4. xi. 7—12. xii. 11—
16. Phil. iii. 12—19. 1 Thes. ii. 1—12.)

V. 38—40. As Job was about to conclude, another particular seems to have occurred to him, concerning which he had not exculpated himself. He had never seized upon lands, by putting the owner to death as a criminal, and confiscating his estate; or by any other oppression or fraud.
Nor had he reaped his harvest, without duly paying his labourers their wages. If he had, let God avenge it, by rendering the whole accursed, producing nothing but useless and noxious weeds. (Notes, Gen. iii. 17—19. iv. 10—12. Jam. v. 1—6.)—With this Job concluded, as with an ir of triumph and confidence.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

“The grace of God, which bringeth salvation,” has,
in all ages, “taught men to deny ungodliness and worldly “lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this “present world.” Repentance and faith produce hatred of sin, and love to God and man; and our interest in redeeming love is evidenced by a course of conscientious obedience. In general, however, it is best to let our actions speak for us: and though, in some cases, we owe to ourselves and to the cause of God, a solemn protestation of innocency, as to those crimes of which we are falsely accused; yet this is seldom made without some real or apparent ostentation.—Every wickedness is first conceived in the heart, where ten thousand enormities are devised which are never perpetrated; being prevented by fear of man, regard to character, or want of opportunity and ability. The eye, the ear, and all the senses are the common inlets of those evil thoughts which excite inward concupiscence: we must therefore keep a strict guard upon them; and upon the imagination also, if we would keep out of the way of temptation and transgression. While we pray to the Lord “to turn away our eyes from beholding “vanity,” we should be careful to have all our senses and faculties occupied about lawful things: and, lest secrecy or the hope of impunity entice us, we should habitually recollect, that “the LORD sees our ways and counts all “our steps.”—Without strict honesty and fidelity in all our dealings, we can have no good evidence of true godliness. Yet how many, who profess to believe the gospel of Christ, are unable to bear this touchstone! Most men haste to deceive: they covet riches, “their heart walketh “after their eyes,” and they turn aside; manifest blots defile their hands; God sees, and man often detects, their dishonesty; and it is well if the ruin of their substance prevent the ruin of their souls.—Alas! that adultery also should be so common among professed Christians! It is indeed highly desirable that the authority of the magistrate should stop the spread of this fire, which destroys domes-tick peace and every principle of purity, honesty, truth, and conscience; and which often provokes retaliation, till whole nations are filled with wickedness. But, if men suffer the criminals to escape, the Judge of the world will surely call them to a severe account; and this is sufficient to put all that fear him on their guard, lest their hearts should at any time be deceived.

CHAP. XXXII.

V. 13—28.

Genuine religion uniformly teaches us to treat inferiors and domesticks with humanity, equity, and affection; to bear with their faults, to sympathize in their troubles, to hearken to their complaints, and to seek their present and future welfare: remembering that they are our brethren, as near to the great Creator, and as capable of eternal salvation, as ourselves. It disposes us likewise to kindness as well as justice towards the poor; to consult their inclinations, to share our comforts with them, whether we have abundance, or only a moderate provision; and to seek an interest in the grateful prayers of the fatherless and the widow, by sparing from our own indulgence, to feed, clothe, educate, or protect them. How contrary then must it be to Christianity, for men to enslave, oppress, and plunder the poor, because they "see their help in the gate," and have the law of the land and the countenance of the ruler on their side! A worse punishment, than the falling off of the arm from the shoulder-blade, awaits such oppressors, especially when they bear and disgrace the Christian name; even "destruction from the LORD, before whose highness they cannot endure." (Jam. ii. 13.) These crimes spring from covetousness, which makes gold a man's confidence, hope, and joy; as if his life consisted in the abundance of his possessions. But divine grace destroys this idolatry, by teaching us to seek our whole happiness from God; to subordinate all other affections to the love of him; and to receive and use all worldly possessions as his stewards, and to his glory. Yet it is to be feared, that but few prosperous Christians can properly appeal to a heart-searching God, that they have not rejoiced because their gains were great. Through the determination to be rich, numbers fall into temptations which ruin their souls, or pierce them through with many sorrows. (Note, 1 Tim. vi. 6—10.) This is the idolatry, to which we are most tempted: but it is a great favour to be preserved from all the false and fashionable kinds of religion, which from age to age supplant "the truth as it is in Jesus," and its sanctifying effects; and which eventually prove "a denial of God above."

V. 29—40.

The Holy Spirit has always taught the children of God to do good against evil; to bless, and not to curse, their enemies; to repress revenge; to forgive as they hope to be forgiven; to avoid all rejoicing in calamities; and to restrain others from revenge and cruelty.—In respect of all these things, and in every particular, we should examine with prayer, how far we are followers of this ancient believer: whether we "use hospitality without grudging," and are "ready for every good work:" whether the fear of reproach or resentment, from the great or the many, do not induce us to neglect our known duty: whether we possess any ill-gotten property to cry out against us; or whether we deprive the labourer of his wages. If our conscience testify for us in these and similar enquiries, we should give God the praise, but we may have confidence now before his mercy-seat; and may hope to stand with humble boldness, as justified believers before his judgment-seat: we need fear no adversary, or accusation, or scrutiny; for "who is he that condemneth? It is God that justifieth;" and the slanders of our enemies will then be our crown: as princes we shall go near unto him, and enter into his glory, and sit down with him on his throne. But let us all judge ourselves, and not cover our sins as Adam: and where we are guilty, let us seek forgiveness; intreating 'the Lord to have mercy upon us, and to write 'all his laws in our hearts,' by the new creating power of his Holy Spirit.

NOTES

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1. Job's opponents were at length silenced, though not convinced. They could not answer his arguments, but they retained their unfavourable opinion of him; and they declined all further dispute, because he was "righteous in his own eyes," and determined, as they thought, at any rate to vindicate himself.

V. 2—5. It is evident, that others besides the disputants were present during this controversy, and Elihu among the rest. His name signifies My God is he. He was the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram, which some suppose to have been the original name of Abraham, to whom Buz was nearly related; though others think that Aram, the son of Kemuel, is meant. Many singular opinions have been formed concerning Elihu: yet it is evident, that he was a young man of singular modesty and wisdom; and not more than man, as some have imagined. He came indeed nearer the true state of the case, than any other of the contending parties; but he bore too hard on Job, and, in some instances, put harsh constructions on his words. (Note, xxxiv. 5—9.) He, however, charged him with no crime, except his misconduct in the management of the argument; and in this respect he was justly displeased both with him and with his friends. He alledged with truth, that Job had been more anxious to vindicate his own character, than to clear up the justice and goodness of God in afflicting him; and that his friends had persisted in condemning him, as a hypocrite, though unable to refute his doctrine, or to answer his arguments. But, as he was younger than they, he had modestly waited till the controversy was dropped, before he attempted to declare his opinion.

V. 6—14. Young men are commonly most forward to dispute, and aged men best qualified to be moderators; but here the case was reversed. Elihu allowed it to be a good general rule, that they who had the advantage of long experience should speak first, and teach wisdom to the young. But he observed, that there was a rational soul in man, and that God gave wisdom, both natural and spiritual, as he pleased; so that facts proved that the greatest and most aged were not always the wisest. This reflection therefore at length emboldened him to state his opinion. He had carefully listened to the arguments of the disputants, as long as they could find any thing to say: but he perceived, that they could neither convict Job of iniquity, nor refute his doctrine. Indeed Elihu thought that they were left to be thus foiled, lest they should glory in their own wisdom, and improperly exult over Job, as proved to be a wicked man, by the testimony of God in his dealings with him. Or, (as some explain the words,) they reluctantly yielded that they were overcome, by counting it their wisdom to be silent, and by leaving it to God to confute Job by continuing his afflictions. But as Job had not spoken against Elihu, he purposed to answer him in a different manner; and, without attempting to prove him a hypocrite, he would reprove some things in which he was evidently culpable.

V. 15—17. These verses favour the opinion, that Elihu was the writer of this book: for he seems here to address himself as the historian to the reader, rather than as a speaker to that company. (Preface.)—He observed, that the disputants had been amazed to hear Job so confidently protest his own integrity, and perplexed to reconcile his situation with the divine justice and goodness, unless he were a wicked man. They had given up the argument, as if deprived of speech; and they seemed to look for some one else to throw light upon the subject. So that he had full liberty to speak his sentiments; having patiently waited for this opening. (Note, 1 Cor. xiv. 26—33.)

V. 18—22. Elihu's mind was full of thoughts, in consequence of his having for a long time silently reflected on the subject, and he was inwardly constrained to speak. With much uneasiness he had refrained himself: his mind was agitated by his own meditations, in the manner that fermenting wine is ready to burst the bottle when it cannot have vent; so that it would be a relief, or enlargement,

CHAP. XXXIII.

Elihu requires Job's attention, while he pleads with him, in God's stead, and without terrifying him, 1—7. He blames him for being too earnest in vindicating himself, and for irreverently complaining of God, 8—13. He shews how God instructs men by dreams, afflictions, and messengers; that repenting they may find mercy, 14—30. He calls on Job to answer, or patiently to attend to his discourse, 31—33.

to him to speak, though it should not profit them. (Notes, Jer. vi. 10—12. xx. 7—9. Ez. iii. 12—15.) He intended to be impartial, and not to flatter either party, though they were his seniors and superiors; but he would freely reprove what he thought wrong in them, without respect of persons. Indeed, he was not used to give flattering titles to any man, and he knew it would displease his Maker; therefore, as he feared his awful displeasure and desired mercy from him, he was determined to avoid them.—The original word signifies, to give an additional name, as a title of distinction.

The self-flattery of the human heart often prevents men from being convinced of their errors, or from acknowledging that they are; so that, even when not determined at all events to have the last word, they will imagine or pretend some plausible reason for declining an argument, in which they have been foiled, whilst they hold their former sentiments, and criminate their opponents. Indeed, it is not worth while to persist in arguing with the pertinacious and self-sufficient, or with such as are “righteous in their own eyes:” yet sometimes those who are accepted with God, and have truth and justice on their side, are unjustly charged with obstinacy and self-confidence.—An unprejudiced by-stander frequently understands controverted points, better than the eager disputants: in almost all contests much may be reprov'd on both sides; and they who endeavour to distinguish between what is right, and what is wrong, among all parties, will seldom be approved by the zealots of any, but will commonly come nearest to the truth.—If we perceive others in a fault, it is generally adviseable, to mention it before them: and it is not sinful anger, if we are greatly displeased to hear God dishonoured, his truths misrepresented, and men unjustly condemned, or fatally deceived. (Note, Mark iii. 5.)—It belongs to the aged to take the lead in conversation, and to teach wisdom; and modesty, and deference towards seniors and superiors, always become the young. Yet reason is common to man, and God communicates both natural abilities and spiritual gifts, in measure as he pleases. “So that great men are not always wise, neither do the aged understand judgment:” and by an attention to the word of God, and dependence upon his Spirit, the young may become wiser than the aged, than their teachers, and their rulers. (Note, Ps. cxix. 98—100.) But this wisdom will render them “swift to hear, and slow to speak,” and disposed to give others a patient attention, though they seem to argue inconclusively, and to say little to the purpose. However full we may think ourselves of suitable matter, for the conviction of others, and the termination of a controversy; and whatever uneasiness we feel in keeping silence, when others are discoursing, as we think, in a manner contrary to truth; we should remember, that it is indecent, and savours of arrogance, to interrupt them. Nay, if we were sure, that the Spirit of God suggested to us what we were about to say, we ought to refrain, until it fairly come to our turn to speak: for “the spirits of the prophets were subject to the prophets,” and God is the Source of order, and not of confusion. (1 Cor. xiv. 32, 33.) But the faithful minister of God, who is filled with the knowledge of his truth and will, and with zeal for his glory and compassion for souls, must be greatly pained by every attempt to silence him: nay, indeed, he cannot be silenced; whatever be the consequence, he cannot but speak the things which he has heard and believed. (Note, Acts iv. 13—22.) Times and seasons he will regard; but he must speak, that he may be refreshed, whether men will hear or forbear; and he must speak faithfully, without respect of persons, or knowing to give flattering titles: for “he is not a man-pleaser, but a servant of Jesus Christ;” and is ambitious, whether present or absent, of being accepted of him. (Notes, 2 Cor. v. 9—12. 16. 1 Thes. ii. 1—8.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 1—7. Elihu had given his reasons for speaking, and here he demanded the attention of Job in particular; for Job himself had sufficiently answered his friends. He did not speak in haste or passion, but deliberately, and with recollection. He meant to speak his undisguised sentiments, in the plainest and most instructive manner: he was the creature of God, dependent on him, and accountable to him; from whose life-giving Spirit he derived his being, and rational nature. Job might therefore stand up before him to make the best of his cause. He had desired an impartial judge to be appointed in God's stead, to decide upon his appeal. (Notes, ix. 25—35. xlii. 20—23. xlii. 3—7. xxxi. 35—37.) And behold here was one according to his wish, a man like himself, who would neither terrify nor hurt him, as the glorious God might have done, if he had entered into judgment with him; nay, who would not bear so hard on him as his other friends had done.

V. 8-11. Elihu had heard Job's words, and did not condemn him upon suspicion, as his friends had done. He did not accuse him of being a hypocrite; but of having spoken language unbecoming a man of piety. He had so strenuously insisted upon his own integrity, that he seemed to say, "I am clean without transgression, I am innocent; neither is there any iniquity in me." Job had not said exactly these words; nay, he had avowed the contrary doctrine: but he had used incautious expressions which admitted of such a construction. The other words charged upon him were nearly what he had spoken. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, x. 4-7. xi. 1-4. xvi. 17-22. xxiii. 8-12.)

V. 12, 13. In this thing at least, Elihu maintained, that Job had been culpable; he had charged God foolishly and unjustly, as if his dealings with him were causelessly severe. But he ought to have recollected the infinite greatness of the almighty Sovereign, which made it the height of madness and presumption to contend with him. He gives no account of his conduct; and which of his creatures has a right to demand an explanation of his reasons, where he sees good to conceal them? (Notes, xl. 1, 2. Dan. iv. 34-37. Matt. xx. 1-16. Rom. ix. 19-21. xi. 33-36.)

V. 14-18. In many things God acts as a Sovereign, who explains not the meaning of his orders; but in general he shews himself a merciful and kind Father. He does not ask men what methods he should use, but he employs such as are most proper. He speaks to them in various ways, and with frequent repetitions; yet they are so dull, careless, and prejudiced, that they perceive not his meaning.—Elihu lived before there was a written revelation, and therefore that grand medium of communication is not mentioned: but God, in that age of the world, frequently spake to men in dreams and visions; and thus, in the dark and retired hours of the night, he caused them even in their sleep to attend to him, and deeply impressed his instructions on their memories. This was intended, not to enable men to understand the reasons of the divine dispensations, but to withdraw them from their sinful purposes, and from their proud rebellion; that, being humbled in repentance, and made sensible of their guilt and depravity, and humbly seeking mercy, by faith and prayer, they might be preserved from that destruction of soul and body, into which they were about to be hurried. Nay, the long-suffering of God, by preserving men from sudden and violent death, when living in sin, kept back their souls from hell, and gave them space for repentance.

V. 19-26. When men disregard the warnings and despise the patience of God, he often sends severe afflictions. And if Job had been afflicted on this account, instead of murmuring against God, and justifying himself, he ought to have considered what sins he had committed, and what duties he had neglected. For God, in love, frequently confined men to beds of sickness, and filled them with exquisite pain in every part, causing them to loathe even the most necessary or delicious food, and reducing them to mere skeletons: and whilst it appeared, that the body was about to drop into the grave, the poor sufferer was perhaps affrighted, lest the soul should fall into the hands of the destroyers. (Note, Ps. cvii. 17—22.) Yet all this tended to good, and often terminated well: especially if some pious person were sent as the “messenger of God,” (as Elihu hoped he was to Job,) to be an interpreter of the painful dispensation, and of the truth and will of God, and to shew the sufferer the way of pardon and peace. (Note, xvii. 1, 2.) As such interpreters were scarce, not one among a thousand being capable of the service, they were the more to be valued: for they would shew the sinner the justice of God in his sufferings and condemnation; his way of pardoning and justifying the penitent believer; his sincerity and faithfulness to his promises; and the way of holiness. Such a messenger frequently proved the instrument of a man's conversion: and the Lord in mercy commanded his deliverance from the pit of destruction, through the ransom, or atonement, which he had appointed and revealed, even that of the promised Messiah; and sometimes restored his health, vigour, and comeliness, as if he were become young again. Thus the sinner was taught to pray unto God, and was pardoned and accepted; thus he had comfortable communion with him at his mercy-seat, and hoped to see his face with joy in heaven; and would at length be graciously recompensed for all the works of righteousness, which he had performed in humble faith and love.—Some interpret this Messenger, or Angel, of Christ himself the Interpreter of God's will to man, the Chief among the ten thousands of his saints and servants. But, as in general he comes to men by his messengers, or ministers; and as their instructions and encouragements are deduced from his meditation, and are made effectual by his gracious presence; it is not very material, whether we interpret the passage, of the messengers of God pointing to the Saviour, or the Saviour revealing himself by their ministry. It is equally immaterial, whether the words, “Deliver him from going down to the pit,” be considered as the language of Christ's intercession, pleading the ransom of his blood, in behalf of the sinner; or the words of the Father accepting of this plea, and giving command to save the sinner, as satisfied with that appointed ransom. It cannot reasonably be doubted, that Elihu had reference to the promised Redeemer, though he might also intend the sacrifices which prefigured the great atonement. (1 Pet. i. 19, 20. Rev. xiii. 8. Notes, Gen. iii. 21. iv. 3—5. viii. 20—22. xii. 6, 7.)

V. 27—30. Elihu further shewed, that God always observed the ways of men; and when any sinner humbly confessed his transgressions of his just and good laws, as unreasonable and unprofitable, being ashamed and weary of them, and grieved and self-condemned for them; he would “deliver his soul from going down into the pit” of destruction, and he should live to enjoy his favour. Thus he brought back sinners from the brink of ruin, to be enlightened in the living and life-giving knowledge of salvation. He awakened their consciences by visions; he visited them with afflictions; he sent them his messengers and his gospel; and by his goodness he thus led them to repentance and salvation. Therefore Job had no reason to think that God was become his enemy; but to hope that he should derive great advantage from his calamities.—The original is rather difficult as to the construction, and has been variously translated: but the grand outline of instruction is not at all affected by the different renderings.

V. 31—33. Elihu again demanded Job's attention, as he had much more to say; but, if he could answer any thing to what he had urged, he would have him speak before he proceeded; for he greatly desired to find that he was a righteous man, and to clear up his aspersed character. But if Job could not refute his charge, let him be silent, and he would proceed to instruct him further in true wisdom.—It seems, that Job was so far convinced by his discourse, that he would not attempt an answer.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

We ought always to discourse on religious subjects, with seriousness, recollection, candour, sincerity, and plainness; if we expect to be heard with attention, and to convince and instruct others. When we have evident truth on our side, we may often convince our opponents, that they can-

CHAP. XXXIV.

Elihu calls on the wise to judge in the cause; and charges Job with arraigning the divine justice, 1—9. He affirms, that the all-powerful and all-perfect God cannot do iniquity; and vindicates his dealings with men, 10—30. He shews Job, that he ought to humble himself before God; and sharply reproves his words, 31—37.

not stand before the tribunal of God, by shewing them that they cannot justify their conduct before a fellow sinner; who will not dismay nor hurt them, while he pleads against them in the behalf of God.—In the heat of controversy, and when greatly afflicted and tempted, we are apt to utter words which cannot be justified: and if a worse construction be put upon them than we intended, we need not wonder, and should not be offended.—Publick offences should be publickly rebuked or retracted, to prevent scandal; but we may allow a man's general character to be good, and yet reprove him for particular offences. If we seem to justify our whole conduct, and murmur against God, in this we are not just: for when we adopt this conduct, the subject impeaches the Sovereign, and the foolish, sinful worm arraigns the conduct of the wise and righteous Lord of all! The infinite power and authority of God should deter us from thus contending with him; for he will not, he cannot, submit his conduct to our judgment. But when we consider that he excels the noblest of his creatures in all things else, as much as in his majesty and greatness, and is in all respects consummate perfection; we must perceive, that every objection to his dispensations is rebellion and ingratitude.

V. 14—33.

The general tendency of all the Lord's dealings with men, is to lead them to repent and to turn unto him; but the proud, careless rebel does not regard, though God speak to him again and again. The works of creation proclaim his eternal power and Godhead, and leave all those without excuse, who neither worship him nor are thankful. He speaks by conscience; but her voice is silenced by the clamorous demands of men's lusts and passions. Terrifying dreams convey forcibly salutary alarms; but unless the Lord open the ear, and seal the instruction, they are speedily forgotten. The judgments of God on others have a warning voice to us; and should serve to withdraw us from our sinful purposes, and to induce us to humble ourselves before him, that we may be kept from the pit of destruction; whilst his merciful protection of us, when others are cut off and we are in danger, should lead us to repentance. When these methods are ineffectual, sharp afflictions become the voice of God. Wasting sickness and excruciating pain mar our relish of every comfort, and remind us of death and eternity. This proclaims the vanity of the world, the evil of sin, the power of God's wrath, our need of mercy, and the danger to which we are exposed. But how many repeatedly endure all this, and yet remain unhumbled and unchanged! It is, however, a token for good, when the servants and ministers of God are sent, to interpret to the afflicted his dispensations and word. This is a good service, and it is lamentable that so few are qualified for it, and take pleasure in it: and it is a most important additional charity, when the sick in hospitals are diligently attended by faithful instructors; as it often proves the means of salvation to their souls. But Christ himself is the only effectual Interpreter; by his Spirit he shews the sinner the way of acceptance and salvation; who, believing, receives the gift of righteousness, and partakes of sanctification. Through the ransom of the atoning blood, his prayers are answered, his soul is rescued, and perhaps his health and comforts are restored: he comes with joy before the mercy-seat, and beholds by faith the countenance of his reconciled Father; while he waits for the Saviour's appearing to judge the world, with animating hope of receiving that crown of righteousness, which is laid up for him in heaven. In short, the eyes of the Lord are upon all the ways of the children of men: he sees them when committing their secret abominations; he sees them when, convinced of guilt, they condemn themselves, abhor their crimes, are covered with shame, and filled with fear of wrath; and when weary of their sins they long for deliverance: and he will assuredly have mercy upon them, and save them. (Notes, Jer. xxxi. 18—20. Luke xv. 17—24.)—By what means soever we are kept back from the pit to be “enlightened with the light of the living,” we shall bless the Lord for them at last, and should bless him for them now, though painful and distressing. To the end of our lives corrections are the needful and salutary means of keeping us near, or bringing us nearer, to God; and, as such, are not only to be submitted to, but to be valued as pledges of his love: for it is immensely better to be “chastened of the Lord, than to be condemned with the world.”—Finally, we should desire to justify others, as far as it can be done consistently with truth: but a wise man will be afraid of too strenuously justifying himself; he will rather hearken to reproof and receive instruction, that he may increase in wisdom and knowledge.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 1—4. Elihu, having paused to hear whether Job had any thing to answer, proceeded to call on those present to attend to his discourse. He addressed them as men of wisdom and discernment; and doubted not, that their understandings would decide, whether the expressions which Job had used were proper or not, as readily as the palate distinguishes the taste of meat: “for the ear should try words, as the mouth tasteth food.” This ought to be the case, and was so with men of knowledge. He desired therefore that certain principles might be laid down, according to which they might form a judgment; and that they would confer among themselves, and come to an explicit determination on the subject.

V. 5—9. In vindicating his character, Job had used language which seemed to imply an intention of fully justifying himself; and, whilst he complained that God dealt rigorously with him, he expressed himself so vehemently, that he appeared to charge God with injustice: when urged to confess his crimes, he still more earnestly protested his righteousness, and a determination not to accuse himself falsely; and in his bitter complainings he spake of his wound as incurable, without admitting that his transgressions had deserved it. (Notes, ix. 14—24. x. 4—7. 14—17. xvi. 17—22. xxi. 7—16. xxvii. 2—6. xxxi. 35—40.) These expressions induced Elihu to conclude, that Job allowed himself in an astonishing licence of language; that he took pleasure in scoffing at the works and truths of God, as well as in scorning the warnings and counsels of his friends; and that he agreed in principles and practice with wicked men, whose company he seemed to prefer, and whose conduct he encouraged; having indeed asserted that no profit would accrue to those, who delighted in God and in his worship and service. Yet Job by no means intended all that Elihu charged upon him. He had not spoken precisely all the words, which, Elihu, quoting from memory, attributed to him; those, which he had used, might admit of a more favourable construction; and other parts of his discourse plainly shewed that his deliberate judgment widely differed from the sentiments, apparently conveyed by some of his detached expressions. He had repeatedly owned that he was a sinner; and he spake of the wicked as reserved to the day of wrath and destruction. (Note, xxi. 27—30.) But Elihu did not condemn Job as a hypocrite: he therefore quietly submitted to his reproof; choosing, as we may suppose, rather to bear more blame than he deserved, than to vindicate himself when he knew that he had been criminal.—Which goeth, &c. (8.) Note, ii. 10.

V. 10—15. Elihu next laid down the principle, by which he desired that Job's conduct might be tried. It must appear, to every pious mind, impious and blasphemous, to intimate that God was capable of committing injustice: but whatever expressions seemed to imply, that he punished without cause, partook of this impiety; and as Job's words implied this charge, they must be condemned. On the contrary it was certain, that the righteous Judge of all would render to every man according to his works; punishing no one above his deserts, nor suffering any of the wicked to escape with impunity; yet graciously rewarding the good works of his upright servants.—And surely none could think that the almighty Sovereign of the world would pervert judgment! His perfections and authority being underived, independent, and absolute, he must be all-sufficient for his own glory and felicity; so that he could not be biassed by fear or partiality. Indeed, if he were disposed to exercise rigorous justice, and to set his heart upon, or against, man; the world was so absolutely at his disposal, that he needed only to recall the spirit, or soul, and withdraw the breath that he had given; and all the inhabitants of the earth would perish, without being able to make the least resistance. (Notes, vii. 17—21. ix. 4—13.)

V. 16—19. In the next place Elihu appealed to Job himself, who was reputed to be a man of understanding, Could he suppose that the great God resembled those earthly princes, who hate right, and abuse their authority, and who are unfit to rule, being the scourges of mankind? If he abhorred that idea, would he allow God to be most just, and yet condemn his conduct in afflicting him? It would be highly criminal, and extremely imprudent, to revile an earthly monarch as a tyrant, or even his nobles as iniquitous and oppressive: or even, to charge blame upon them, without cause. How impious and infatuated must it then be to accuse the almighty God in such a manner, whose justice is as absolute as his authority; and who in perfect impartiality regards the poor as much as the rich, having formed both as his creatures, and made the one poor and the other rich, in his providence! (Notes, Ex. xxiii. 6—9. Prov. xxii. 2. Acts x. 34, 35. Jam. ii. 1—7.)

V. 20—30. Men respect the great, from dread of their resentment, as well as desire of their favour; but God could have no inducement of this kind. If then he saw good to inflict vengeance, he was able to cut off the most powerful, by a sudden and irresistible stroke: as earthquakes or other calamities sometimes in a moment overwhelmed whole multitudes, at midnight, when asleep or most secure; at once they were troubled and destroyed, even the mightiest of them, without any human concurrence. (Notes, Gen. xix. 24, 25. Ex. xii. 29, 30. xiv. 24—31. 2 Kings xix. 35—37. Ps. lxxiii. 18—22.) His omnipresence and omniscience could not be evaded, nor his omnipotence resisted; (Marg. Ref. i—1;) yet he would punish none above their deserts, nor use his power to oppress, that any one should have just cause to institute a process against him. But whilst he crushed the mightiest without number, (or search, as if he must take time to examine evidences,) and exalted others to their stations; he knew all their secret sins, and therefore destroyed them at once. Many he thus openly punished, for an example to others, as malefactors are scourged or executed publicly: especially apostates, or impious persons, or hypocrites; who by their oppression of the poor, caused them to cry and pray unto him, and he heard and avenged them. (Notes, xxii. 5—14. xxiv. 2—12. xxxi. 16—23. 38—40.) In short, if he were pleased to give outward prosperity or inward peace, none could interrupt it: but if he in anger withdrew his protecting or comforting presence, none could obtain the benefit or enjoyment of it; and whole nations were as liable to these changes as individuals. Indeed, one great design of all these dispensations was, to deprive ambitious hypocrites of the authority, which they sought by iniquitous means, and abused to bad purposes; ensnaring, corrupting, oppressing, or fatally prejudicing the people, over whom they aspired to reign.—Even Elihu seems to have had some suspicions, that Job was a dissembler; and spake as if he was at a loss how to reconcile his calamities with his character for piety; and thought the case would have been plain, if he had been a hypocrite, advanced to authority, but now depressed, lest he should lead the people into sin and misery. Yet he did not venture to condemn him, but hoped the best.

When he giveth, &c. (29) Or, “If he impart peace, “who can condemn a man as wicked?” (Notes, Rom. v. 1, 2. viii. 28—34.)

V. 31—37. Elihu maintained, that it behoved Job to speak and act in a far different manner under his afflictions: it was meet that any man, in his situation, should express himself with humble resignation to the will of God; should consider his afflictions as a chastisement, and a call to repent of his sins; and should purpose and promise greater watchfulness against them. He ought to intreat the Lord to teach him what he did not know, and to convince him of those sins which he did not recollect; determining by divine grace to repent and forsake them. But could Job suppose, that things would be ordered according to his mind, while he continued so rebellious? Did he expect that God would change his plan to please him? No; he would certainly recompense him for his harsh and rash speeches, and his other sins, whether he rebelled against the correction, or submitted to it. This was the Lord's doing, not Elihu's; though he warned him, and advised him to retract his words, and humble himself before God. Let him, however, give the best reasons for his conduct, that he was able; for hitherto any wise man would determine Job's words to have been very erroneous. He desired therefore that his conduct might be fully investigated, nay, that his heavy trials might continue till he was humbled, and brought to retract his confident self-justification: for he had in fact made an excuse for wicked men, as if their conduct was not so ruinous and hateful as it really was. So that rebellion against Providence was added to his other sins: yea, he had concluded his protestation of innocence, with an air of insulting triumph over his opponents; and had multiplied his words against God himself. (Note, xxxi. 35—40.)—Job had given some ground for these charges: but Elihu evidently made the worst of his expressions, and criminated him much more than the Lord afterwards did. (Notes, xxxviii. 2. xl. 1—8. xlii. 1—9.)—Several of the clauses in these verses are to us very difficult, and consequently are differently interpreted. That which appeared the most satisfactory interpretation has been chosen. Bishop Patrick paraphrases the thirty-third verse thus: 'Hast thou addressed thyself to God in this manner? Answer me that question; for God will recompense it, if thou dost despise such good counsel; which perhaps thou wilt choose to do; but so would not I. Speak therefore what thy opinion is.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—15.

It is generally prudent to conciliate the affections of all, whose benefit we seek, or whose help we want, by acknowledging in them the good which they really possess; and when we address men, as endued with wisdom and piety, we cogently admonish them to act consistently with their character: nor should we withhold this tribute of respect from any, because we deem them in some respects mistaken.—An appeal may safely be made to the plainest person, whose understanding is enlightened, and whose heart is sanctified, by the Spirit of God, and who is well versed in the Scriptures, how far such and such sentiments, expressions, tempers, and actions, accord with the Christian character: and he will readily decide a case, when impartially stated, with more accuracy, than the most sagacious of those, who are wise in this world, and "lean to their own understanding." For he chooses to himself the oracles of God as his standard; and by experience, observation, and conference with his brethren, he has his

"senses exercised to discern good and evil," and to know, approve, and savour that which is good. (Notes, Phil. i. 9—11. Heb. v. 11—14.)—It is discordant in the ears of a spiritual man, to hear persons intent on justifying themselves; or reflecting on the dealings of God, as unjust or unkind; or supposing that they suffer without remedy, or transgression. He listens to their words with distress and astonishment, and is apt to suspect them of pride, and contempt of God. He thinks, that they imitate the example, and join themselves to the company, of evil doers, and he is ready to infer, that they consider religion itself as unprofitable. This jealousy for the honour of God, and deep acquaintance with the depravity of man, will indeed sometimes render pious persons too suspicious; and too severe in censuring such as vindicate themselves from unjust aspersions, in an unguarded manner: and thus they will fail of making due allowance for circumstances of peculiar temptation and difficulty. But the believer, when convinced that his reprover means well, and when conscious of having deserved censure, will, on calm reflection, submit to those rebukes which are too rigorous, rather than engage in minute exculpation.—All pious men have ever agreed, that it is delightful and profitable to serve God; they all abhor the thought of charging him with injustice; they are satisfied that his moral perfections are underived, absolute, and unchangeable, as well as his power and authority; they know that he readily could, and justly might, consign the bodies of all the millions of the human species to the dust, and their souls to destruction; and it appears to them madness to provoke him "in whom our breath is, and whose are all our ways." And while life and hope remain, they cannot deliberately allow, that a sinner can have cause to murmur, but are sure that he must have great cause to be thankful.

V. 16—37.

It is evident, that it must be immensely more dangerous and atrocious to arraign the conduct of God, than that of any earthly prince. Yet all our murmurs, when duly investigated, will be found to have a tendency to the blasphemous sentiment, that the Governor of the world hates right: they condemn him who is most just, and are therefore pregnant with rebellion. But indeed his impartiality and condescension are infinite; "he accepts not the persons of princes, nor regards the rich more than the poor." When he sees good to punish, destruction is inevitable; and frequently comes with sudden and dreadful surprise, upon the careless multitude, or the haughtiest potentate. "His eyes are upon the ways of men, and he seeth all

CHAP. XXXV.

Elihu further reproves Job's words in justifying himself; and shews, that the effects of man's conduct extend to man alone, and not to God, 1—8. He observes, that if God hear not the cry of the oppressed, it is because they do not address him aright, 9—13. He exhorts Job to patience and trust in God, 14—16.

“their goings:” there is no secret cavern, or midnight-darkness, “where the workers of iniquity can hide themselves” or their crimes, from their omnipresent Judge; or where they may shelter themselves from his omnipotent indignation. But he will never give any man cause to appeal from his judgment, by laying upon him more than he deserves. He knows the works of all men, and sees far more evil in every one of us, than we suspect: therefore in his most terrible judgments his justice must be acknowledged; and even when “the wicked shall be turned into hell, and “all the nations that forget God,” the publishing of their crimes will demonstrate the righteousness of their dreadful doom. But the vengeance of the Almighty, either here or hereafter, will be most terrible against apostate professors of his holy religion; those who have deliberately rejected his authority, and his gospel; and such as have cloaked their ambitious designs under a hypocritical profession of piety. Men of these characters will perhaps be disappointed and exposed in this world, for a warning to others, and to prevent the effect of their crimes. It is however certain, that those who have the Lord for their adversary must eventually be wretched. But, if “he be “for us, who can be against us?” If he give quietness, who “can create trouble?” The slanderer's envenomed tongue, the persecutor's cruel rage, the tempter's malicious assaults, with pain, poverty, tortures, and impending death, in vain attempt to render those miserable whom God comforts, or to separate his people from his love. This “indeed is the heritage of the servants of the LORD;” but it is also proposed to the chief of sinners: and chastenings often concur with his word in warning them “to “flee from the wrath to come.” It is meet, that we should address ourselves unto God, when he afflicts us, with the language of humble submission: confessing our transgressions, and praying to be further enlightened in the knowledge of his truth, and in an acquaintance with our own sinfulness; and that he would incline and enable us to repent; and to forsake all our sins; that “where we have “done iniquity, we may do so no more.” When we are brought to this frame of spirit, we shall see it unreasonable to expect that matters should be according to our minds: we shall perceive, that whether we refuse or choose, God will chasten us as much and as long as he sees good; and probably this will be, till we kiss the rod and welcome the correction. But alas! how often are our tempers and conduct contrary to this reasonable state of mind!—When we have spoken all we know, men of understanding and wisdom will agree that we have uttered things, which sprang from ignorance or error, or savour of pride and ingratitude; nay, we shall often upon a review be conscious of it ourselves. As far as this emboldens wicked men in their crimes, or hardens them in their prejudices, it should be openly retracted; and all concerned should combine to convince the offender and bring him to repentance. This is an act of genuine friendship: but we should be careful not to do it with asperity, or to represent the words and actions of our brethren, as worse than they are. It is, however, desirable for us all to be tried completely; and even to have our afflictions continued, till they have done their work: for it is better to be severely reprov'd and chastened, than to be left to persevere in rebellion, to prosper in iniquity, to triumph in error, and to multiply words and transgressions against God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 1—3. As Job attempted no answer, Elihu proceeded still further to reprove his improper language. Job had laboured to prove, that there was no exact discrimination in this world between the righteous and the wicked; and he seemed to Elihu to assert that it would be no advantage to any one, (as it had been none to him,) to seek diligently to be cleansed from sin. This he thought equivalent to saying, “that his righteousness was more “than God's:” for he did his duty; but God did not fulfil his promises, nay, he punished him more severely than he deserved. Job had not spoken exactly these words, and certainly had no such meaning: but he had dropped some expressions capable of being thus understood; and it was proper they should be noticed, lest others should make a bad use of them. (Notes, ix. 22—24. x. 4—7. xxi. 7—16. xxvii. 2—6.)

If I be cleansed from my sin (3) מִכִּלְטִי: “by it more “than by my sin.” (Marg.) This appears to be the more exact rendering. ‘What profit shall I have by my righteousness more than by my sin?’

of which were higher than he, out of his reach, and not in the least affected by his conduct: it must then be evident, that the infinitely glorious God could not be either a gainer or loser by any of his actions. (Note, xxii. 1—4.) The most numerous and atrocious crimes, which men could perpetrate, would not interrupt the divine felicity; nor could any human righteousness profit God, or confer an obligation upon him. His government was therefore administered upon the purest principles of equity and wisdom, for the display of his own glorious perfections, and for the greatest good of the universe. And therefore, as the Lord acted upon such fixed and immutable principles; it was absurd and impious, to suppose that he deviated from rectitude, in any particular instance, to punish those who did not deserve it; or that piety could eventually prove unprofitable to the pious man himself.

V. 9—13. Job had stated that the oppressed cry out, but are not delivered, and that the oppressors remain unpunished: (Note, xxiv. 2—12:) and Elihu, in shewing how the wickedness of some men made others to suffer, attempted to account for this. The afflicted cried out indeed by reason of the power of their oppressors: but they did not repent, or seek comfort from God, who can fill the hearts of his servants with joy, and their mouths with songs of praise, in the darkest night of distress. (Notes, Ps. xlii. 6—10. Hab. iii. 17—19. Acts xvi. 25—28. Rom. v. 3—5.)—The Creator had endued men with a capacity of knowing more than the beasts and fowls; having formed them capable of receiving the knowledge of his being and perfections, his works, and truths, and precepts: and thus of seeking help and comfort from him, under their troubles. But those who only groaned under distresses, without repentance, faith, or prayer, did no more than the brutes, which cry out when they are pained. Therefore they receive no answer from God, when suffering under the oppression of proud tyrants; for he would not regard the vain and rebellious complaints of ungodly men. (Notes, Judg. x. 13—16. 2 Sam. xxii. 37—42. Prov. i. 24—31. Is. lvii. 13. lviii. 2—12. lix. 1—8. John ix. 27—34.) And indeed Job's complaint, that the Lord would not hear his cry, (xix. 7,) as Elihu supposed, originated from a similar cause: for though he might not be an ungodly man, yet he had not duly humbled himself under his afflictions, and therefore he was disregarded.

V. 14—16. Job had frequently expressed himself, as not having any hope, that the Lord would appear for his relief; but Elihu reminded him, that God set judgment before him, and always acted in wisdom, equity, and faithfulness: he would therefore certainly do him justice; and he would likewise shew him mercy, if he duly sought it; and he exhorted him to trust in him and wait his time. But as he had yielded to unbelief and impatience, the Lord had visited him in anger; and so long as he indulged the same rebellious spirit, he would not know him, or take any favourable notice of him, in his greatest extremity. Therefore he hitherto had spoken to no purpose; but had multiplied inconsiderate and sinful words, in disputing with his friends, when he ought to have been humbling himself before God.

He knoweth it not. (15) 'Job (marg.) knoweth not, or doth not acknowledge, his sin; or knoweth not how he ought to act, though exceedingly tried and afflicted.'—So many understand the clause.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is very useful to appeal to men's reason and conscience, concerning their conduct in those things, which have been evidently faulty: for many speak and do in haste, and when warmed in dispute, what they will not deliberately justify. Indeed, the expressions of men, when angry, are often worse than their meaning: and though it is unfair to condemn them for inferences which they disallow; yet it is proper to shew them, how their words may produce bad consequences; in order that they may be humbled for their rashness, and speak more cautiously another time.—The immensity of the works of God may lead us to some feeble apprehensions of his infinite Majesty; and the consideration of his underived and unchangeable glory and felicity should convince us, that all his commandments, judgments, and dispensations result from his unchangeable perfections. He forbids and punishes that which is evil in itself, and tends to misery: he commands and delights in what is good and tends to felicity, without any possible accession to his own infinite blessedness. This is the proper display of his own glory, and demands the tribute of our adoring praise. The Judge of all the earth cannot but do what is right, though we are often incapable of discerning the reasons of his conduct: but, as we have all multiplied transgressions against him, and as he cannot receive any thing from us, which he has not first given unto us, we can have no cause to complain of hard measure when afflicted: and as our Judge is now, as a Saviour, on a mercy-seat, we can have no reason to conclude, that it would be in vain for us to repent, to seek forgiveness, and to cleanse ourselves from our iniquities: and when impatience, pride, and unbelief suggest such conclusions, we associate ourselves for the time with the workers of iniquity, and expose ourselves to just reproofs.—Whilst a righteous man becomes a publick blessing, in proportion to his station in society, the exalted oppressor multiplies iniquities and miseries: and though the oppressed, through their own criminality, may fail of finding redress; or though God may leave them for a time under this trial for their good; yet he will certainly at length punish the haughty oppressor. But how few of the afflicted, who groan under their miseries, enquire after God and trust in his name! The most, even of the wretched, disregard their obligations and accountableness to him, and refuse to repent and humble themselves for their sins, and to seek forgiveness and comfort from him. But to humble believers he causes light to arise in the darkness; and he fills their mouths with songs of deliverance, in the midnight season of tribulation.—God our Creator having formed us after his own likeness, has made us far more capable of knowledge than the brute creation: but alas! sin has rendered us more stupid in many things than they; and, except we partake of renewing grace, we are prone to murmur under our sufferings, without enquiring after the cause or the remedy. These howlings of distress are not acceptable to God: they are vain, selfish, and consistent with the grossest impiety and enmity: and therefore we need not wonder, that impenitent sufferers are left, without succour, to endure the just punishment of their obstinate wickedness, even from the hands of oppressors more wicked than themselves.—If pious persons are betrayed into any degree of a similar spirit, and delay to humble themselves under the afflicting hand of God, or to seek all their help and comfort from him; they may expect that their trials will be continued, till they are reduced to a better temper. In all these things “the LORD is a God of judgment, and by his actions are weighed.” All his works are in wisdom and justice; and he shews mercy to those who humbly trust in him. impatience, and unbelief, he will infuse more anger into the bitter cup; he will withhold comfort, and appear to disregard the extremities, to which even his people are reduced. Then their rebellious murmurs only add to their guilt and vexation, and they multiply words without knowledge, in attempting to excuse themselves. Let us not then, under affliction, prolong our own misery, by keeping at a distance from the throne of grace, standing in our own vindication, expecting help from other quarters, or despairing of help from God: but let us call upon him in our troubles, and he will hear us, and we shall praise him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVI. V. 1—4. As Job still received Elihu's reproofs in humble silence, Elihu again demanded his attention: indeed, he supposed that he was entitled to it, as he was speaking in the cause of God, and to vindicate his righteousness, which had been apparently denied. He had some arguments to adduce, which had not occurred to the other speakers, and which were brought from afar, or originally derived from divine revelation: he promised that he would admit of no flattery, calumny, or sophistry into his discourse; and he was confident that his knowledge upon the subject, was so clear and complete, as to be worthy of their most serious regard.

V. 5—15. In this passage Elihu laid down his system of divine providence; in which he spake more accurately than the other disputants had done, without attempting to decide upon Job's character. Yet he seems to have leaned to the sentiments of Job's friends, that, in some way or other, temporal deliverance and prosperity, or the contrary, generally distinguished betwixt the righteous and the wicked.—He observed that God was “mighty in strength and wisdom:” yet, contrary to the common example of the wise and powerful in this world, he despised not the persons or causes of the meanest of his subjects; he overlooked none, and oppressed none; and he noticed the most ignorant, poor, and contemptible of the earth, and would surely do them justice; yea, they all partook of his common benefits; and the criminal likewise of his special mercies, when willing to seek for them.—Elihu further stated, that wicked men were not under that peculiar protection, which secured the righteous; and therefore their lives were more exposed, and generally terminated prematurely; and this indeed might often take place by the judgment of God, in doing right to the poor whom they had injured. But assuredly He continually noticed and took care of his people: sometimes he advanced them to temporal authority; they were at all times watched over, with as much care as the greatest monarchs, whose lives were of great importance to multitudes; and they would be sure at last to be established for ever, in the most exalted and glorious state. If in this world, they were imprisoned by oppressors, or in any other way afflicted and distressed, it was intended for their benefit: the Lord would then shew them whatever was sinful in their conduct; thus he would dispose them to receive instruction, and enforce their obligations to repent and turn from every sin, and follow after holiness. (Notes, Heb. xii. 4—13.) When they were brought more humbly and faithfully to submit and to obey, and worship him, he would restore and increase their comforts and prosperity, and they would spend their lives in peace and pleasure. But if any continued obstinate and impenitent, they might expect to be cut off by some sudden judgment, and to perish in their sins. Thus hypocrites, who cloked their secret crimes with a shew of piety, treasured up wrath: because, when bound with "the cords of affliction," they refused to humble themselves and cry for help unto God. They were therefore often cut off prematurely, or left to apostatize, and spend their lives among the most atrocious sinners, increasing their own condemnation: and at last they would be doomed to misery with the most abominable transgressors, such as were the unclean inhabitants of Sodom. be delivered from their afflictions; and their oppressions would prove lessons of useful and durable instruction.—Exceeded. (9) Or, strengthened themselves.

V. 16—21. Elihu next applied his doctrine to the case of Job. He was persuaded, that God would, before that time, have delivered him out of trouble, and restored him to liberty, comfort, and plenty, if he had behaved properly under correction. But he had copied the language, and sanctioned the rebellions, of the wicked. It was not therefore necessary to determine what his former character had been: at present he certainly was suffering justly; and, as the wrath of God was kindled against him, instead of persevering to provoke the Lord by presumptuous murmurs, he ought to be very careful what he spake: for a single stroke of Omnipotence, suddenly inflicted in wrath, would take him away beyond the reach of any ransom: so that, if he had possessed all the riches and power in the world, it would not be accepted, nor avail, for the deliverance of his soul. He ought not therefore, so earnestly to desire (or pant after) the night of death, that he might rest from his sufferings: for in his present rebellious state of mind it was likely to come in wrath, if at all; and he should remember, that men by it were cut off, in that place, or state, in which they had lived and were found, and their sentence was then rendered irreversible. He ought therefore to take heed, that he allowed himself in no sin, and especially that he did not unjustly reflect upon God; for it had appeared from many of his expressions, that he actually chose iniquity rather than affliction.—No doubt Elihu in this conclusion was far too severe on Job; for, though he had impatiently and rashly wished for death, he had never at all insinuated that he preferred sin to suffering.

V. 22—33. Elihu here again renewed his attempt to convince Job of his presumption, by representing to him

CHAP. XXXVII.

Elihu extols the power of God, shewn in thunder and lightning, snow, rain, whirlwinds, and frost, 1—13. His works in these things are inexplicable, 14—22. His perfections should impress men with lowly fear, 23, 24.

tinue unhumbled under rebukes and chastenings, they prolong their own sufferings, and bring their characters into doubt, both with themselves and others. The impiety, even of the wicked, is greatly aggravated by their obstinacy under afflictions and terrors. Many of them thus provoke God to cut them off: and in this way hypocrites especially fill up the measure of their iniquities; for it is undeniable that judgments and mercies make less impression upon them, than upon the openly profane: and whether sinners die in youth, or live long to heap up wrath, their case is dreadful, and their eternal portion must be among the abominable and unclean.

V. 16—33.

It is lamentable, that men professing godliness should ever so yield to murmurs and despondency, as to seem to favour the cause, and justify the objections, of the wicked. Surely they ought to be plainly rebuked; and even warned not to deceive themselves, but to fear lest that wrath come upon them, which awaits “the workers of iniquity:” for how can it be determined that they are the servants of God, who are imitating the conduct of his enemies? It is therefore proper to remind any one, who murmurs against the Lord’s appointments, of the power of his wrath, the strictness of his justice, and the unchangeableness of his judgments. If he cut off the sinner by the stroke of his wrath, all the treasures and all the power on earth will be utterly unavailing. Nay, the great ransom of the Saviour’s blood will not in any respect profit the finally impenitent and unbelieving. The ransom indeed is of infinite sufficiency; but if rejected till the night of death comes, the door of mercy is then shut, and hope expires for ever. Yet men often desire death, and even rush upon it, to get rid of present uneasiness, while perfect strangers to this great atonement; as if in haste to be for ever removed from the sound and hope of salvation! And believers seldom vehemently wish for death, when the evidences of their acceptance are most bright, or their graces in most lively exercise. All then should remember, that men at death are cut off in their place, and their condition becomes eternally irreversible. (Note, Ec. xi. 3—6.) Instead therefore of shrinking from adversity, we should seek deliverance from the love and power of sin; and prefer the greatest suffering to the cellency; and ^f he will not stay them when his voice is heard.

5 God ^g thundereth marvellously with his voice: ^h great things doeth he, ⁱ which we cannot comprehend.

6 For ^j he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth; ^k likewise to the small rain, and to the ^l great rain of his strength.

7 ^m He sealeth up the hand of every man; ⁿ that all men may know his work.

8 Then ^o the beasts go into dens, and remain in their places.

9 Out of the ^p south cometh ^q the whirlwind, and cold out of the ^r north.

least iniquity. Yet alas! most men “choose iniquity rather than affliction:” “They ease their cares by sinful pleasures, they increase their wealth by sinful pursuits, escape their troubles by sinful projects, and evade sufferings by sinful compliances.” Henry. But this is a miserable choice, of which they will at length bitterly repent; for the favour of God alone can exalt or make us happy. He alone can teach us to behave wisely and live comfortably in every situation: he needs no counsellor, and allows of no accuser; but justly requires all to admire the discoveries of his glory which they can understand; to adore the depths they cannot comprehend; and to stand in awe of his unsearchable wisdom, power, and authority.—Every appearance in nature at once displays, and conceals, his infinite glories: much remains incomprehensible; but enough is seen to call forth our gratitude, animate our praises, or excite our consternation. The clouds and rain, with the thunders and lightnings, declare his goodness, and proclaim “the power of his wrath.” Each object bears a double aspect; and while the worker of iniquity ought to tremble, the true believer should rejoice. (Notes, Ps. xcvi. 1. xcix. 1—3.) “It is the glorious God that maketh “the thunder,” as well as that fertilizes the earth; and the children should hear with pleasure their father’s voice, even when nature seems convulsed, and he speaks in terror to his enemies. (Note, Ps. xxix. 3—11. P. O.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVII. V. 1—13. In these verses Elihu continues his discourse. The nearer approach of the thunderstorm caused him inwardly to tremble, as if his heart was “moved out of its place.” He therefore called on Job and all the company to hearken, with attention and awe, to the thunder, as the majestick voice of God. Whatever account might be given of the second causes, which produced these tremendous effects; the great First Cause must be acknowledged in them, who thus alarmed the minds of careless sinners.—The giving of the law was attended by tremendous thunders and lightnings; and so was the Lord’s speaking to Job out of the whirlwind. (Notes, xxxviii. 1. Ex. xix. 16—20. Heb. xii. 18—21.)—By the divine mandate, the flashes of lightning darted from one part of the sky to the other; along with the crashing roar of the thunder, which, not reaching the ear so soon as the lightning did the eye, seemed to follow it. This voice of God surpassed all other sounds, in majesty and solemnity: nor could any one stay, or prevent, the effects of it when he pleased thus to speak in terror. In this he wrought marvellously, and all his works were great and incomprehensible. Whether he commanded the snow, the gentler rains, or the more impetuous showers sweeping all before them, he acted in a manner which man could not explain. By tempestuous weather he put a stop to the works of men, as if their hands were sealed up: and this gave them leisure to consider “his works;” while the beasts retired and lay inactive in their dens. When the wind blew from the south, terrible whirlwinds were excited; and when it shifted to the north, cold weather ensued: but who could understand the manner, in which these changes were wrought? Indeed, the wind might be called the “breath of God;” and by it, when he pleased, the inexplicable frost was produced, and the rivers were contracted, or formed into a solid substance. The thick clouds were wearied and worn out, by watering the earth: and often by the shining of the sun on them, they appeared bright, and the beauteous rainbow was formed. But all these were turned about by the counsels of God, and executed his commands in every part of the earth; whether by drought, or excess of rain, he corrected a guilty nation, or by moderate rain he shewed mercy to a favoured land.

V. 14—20. Elihu next called on Job to consider and explain all these wonderful appearances; and if he could not, to confess his presumption, in arraigning the more mysterious dispensations of the divine government. Did he know when God made all these arrangements? Or could he understand how light and fire were produced from the watery cloud, or the splendid rainbow from the dark cloud? Could he explain in what manner the clouds were balanced to move about, continue in the air, or descend in showers? or how the air grew warm, and his garments too heating, when the gentle south wind blew? Had he assisted in spreading the expanse of heaven, which was immoveably strong, and in which, as in a mirrour, the reflection of the divine glory might be perceived?—Mirrours were in those days formed of brass, cut into a proper form and highly polished. (Note, Ex. xxxviii. 8.)—If Job could explain these matters, and teach those present how to speak of God, it would be very acceptable: for they were conscious, that they could not order their discourses on such subjects with clearness or certainty; because of their own ignorance, and the darkness that rested upon the manner, in which the works of God were performed. Indeed, Elihu must acknowledge, that all he had spoken was beneath the subject, and unworthy of the Lord’s acceptance, or of being mentioned to him at all: for he found his thoughts and powers swallowed up, and lost in this bottomless abyss.

V. 21—24. Whilst Elihu was speaking, he observed that the wind had scattered the clouds, and the lightnings were ceased, and that the north wind had brought on fair weather, bright and resplendent as gold; for that is the meaning of the original word. (Marg.—Zech. iv. 12. marg.) In these and all the works of God his glorious and terrible majesty were displayed. How presumptuous then must it be, to contend with him; when his ordinary works were too dazzling for man to look upon!—It is evident, that to-

CHAP. XXXVIII.

The Lord, out of the whirlwind, challenges Job to answer him, 1—3. By enumerating several of his mighty works in creation and providence, he con-wards the close of his discourse, Elihu spake as one in great confusion. Some conjecture, that what is rendered, "Fair weather cometh out of the north," referred to some glorious appearance in the north, which intimated the Lord's immediate presence, as about to speak. Elihu therefore hastened to conclude; briefly declaring, that the almighty God was unsearchable and incomprehensible; that he infinitely excelled all creatures, in power, justice, and judgment; and that he would oppress none, nor afflict any without cause. Men ought therefore to stand in awe of him, and fear to offend him, or to murmur against his appointments: for he disregarded all the supposed wisdom of those, who deemed themselves authorized or qualified to scrutinize and find fault with his conduct. (Notes, xxxiii. 12, 13. Is. xl. 12—17. Dan. iv. 34—37. Rom. ix. 19—21. xi. 33—36.) Elihu evidently thought, that Job had been thus irreverent and presumptuous; and when the Lord himself spake, he brought exactly the same charge against him. (Notes, xxxviii. xl. 1—5.)—In what other ancient book, can be found so exalted and just sentiments and reasonings, on the perfections and works of God, as every where occur in the sacred volume?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

The attentive mind will perceive affecting displays of the power, wisdom, goodness, and majesty of God, in the operations of nature; and the terrors excited by some of them, should remind us of that tremendous scene which will usher in "the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men." If the thunder-storm caused the heart of pious Elihu to tremble and start;—if Moses was exceedingly alarmed before mount Sinai;—if even faith and love to God cannot utterly preserve men from dismay, in these inferior circumstances of terror;—what will be the horror and despair of the wicked at that tremendous season? Oh, that men would attentively hearken unto the voice of God, who in various ways "warns them to flee from the wrath to come;" and from his mercy-seat, with a voice of less terror, but of more glorious excellency, invites them to accept of his salvation and be happy!—All irrational creatures obey the voice and subserve the will of the great Creator: surely then we, whom he hath endued with reason, should be shamed into obedience and submission! We behold the marvellous works of God, and partake of his bounty, in the revolution of the seasons, and the change of the weather: for heat and cold, rain, snow, or dry weather, have their several beneficial effects. But who can fully comprehend the whole mechanism of Nature, or rather of these operations of God? How incompetent then must we be to explain the mysteries of his incomprehensible and eternal existence, of his decrees, or of his universal government! But as they, who know nothing of natural philosophy, receive the full benefit of the revolving seasons; while those who are most informed, cannot evade the inclemency of the weather, or prevent storms, or secure themselves against their effects: so the simplest believer vinces Job of ignorance, 4—30; and of weakness, 31—41.

THEN the LORD answered Job ^a out of the whirlwind, and said, may receive the benefit and comfort of divine mysteries, and the Lord's protection; while the proudest and most learned objector cannot annul his counsels, alter his dispensations, or escape his vengeance. Our wisdom then consists, in accommodating ourselves to the situation allotted us; and in deriving benefit, as we can, from those appointments which we cannot alter; in accepting of proffered mercy in the Lord's way; in submitting to his correction and his righteousness; and in leaving all difficulties to another world.—When Providence takes us off from secular employments, we should occupy ourselves more entirely in meditating on the works of God, in the study of his word, and in the exercises of devotion: else, in what do we surpass the beasts, who retire and remain in their dens?—The weather is altogether of God's appointment: it is generally ordered in mercy as well as in wisdom, for the common good; and if at any time it be really afflictive, it is sent for correction, and to call us to repentance and prayer. But the bad opinion which men entertain of the divine management, is evident in their incessant murmurs in this particular; though the result of the whole system, through the year, generally demonstrates the folly and ingratitude, as well as the rebellion, of their complaints. Believers should carefully avoid such peevishness: there are no bad days as the Lord makes them; but we make ourselves many by our sins.

V. 14—24.

In all our discourses of the works of God, we either are conscious of our own ignorance, or we soon expose it. "We cannot order our speech by reason of darkness," or teach one another satisfactorily in these sublime subjects: we may well be ashamed of our best attempts to magnify the glorious excellences and works of God: indeed, we have nothing to boast of on any account; but must still confess, not only that we are unprofitable servants, but that we are wretched sinners. In short, "with God is terrible majesty." We cannot search him out, or comprehend his designs: but if our meditations lead us to more admiring adoring views of his greatness, holiness, justice, wisdom, and goodness;—if they terminate in a deeper sense of our own ignorance, vileness, and sinfulness;—if they warn us to reverence and submit to him, and to cease from our own wisdom;—the effect will be honourable to him, useful to us, and edifying to our brethren. And, whatever scenes we witness, whatever changes we experience, we may stay our minds on him, who will "give strength to his people, and bless" them with his unspeakable peace.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 1. Both Job and his opponents had appealed to the Lord, and earnestly desired that he would decide the controversy. Job had silenced, but he had not convinced, his friends: Elihu had silenced Job, but had not brought him to plead guilty; and his character was yet undecided. The debate would therefore have ter-

17 Have 'the gates of death been opened unto thee? or hast thou seen the doors of 'the shadow of death?

18 Hast thou perceived 'the breadth of the earth? declare if thou knowest it all.

19 ¶ Where is 'the way where light dwelleth? and as for 'darkness, where is the place thereof?

20 That thou shouldest take it 'to the bound thereof, and that thou shouldest know the paths to the house thereof?

21 Knowest thou it, 'because thou wast then born? or because the number of thy days is great?

22 ¶ Hast thou entered into 'the treasures of the snow? or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail,

23 'Which I have reserved against the time of trouble, against the day of battle and war?

24 By what way is 'the light parted, which scattereth the east wind upon the earth?

25 Who hath 'divided a water-course for the overflowing of waters, or a way for the lightning of thunder;

26 To cause it to rain on the earth,

'as a little babe in the hands of God.' The vast hollows of the earth are its appointed place, in which it is confined, as with bolts and bars: and though it is vehemently tossed by tempestuous winds, and the tides roll its billows to the shore, as if it were about to cover the earth again; yet, at the Lord's command the storm subsides, and the tide rolls back; and he deals with this most furious element, as easily as with an infant: and this, not so much by the barrier of the shores, as by virtue of that inexplicable property, which we call gravitation.—Thus he stays the proud or swelling waves of the sea, and assigns them their bounds which they cannot pass. (Notes, Gen. i. 9, 10. vii. 10—12. Ps. xciii. 3, 4. civ. 6—9. Prov. viii. 26. 30. Jer. v. 20—25. Matt. viii. 23—27.) But had Job any hand in contriving or effecting this? Or could he comprehend how it was done?

V. 12—15. It was evident, that the things hitherto mentioned had existed before Job was born; by which he might be led to reflect upon the eternity of God, and contrast it with the few days of his own past life. But had he, during that short time, given orders for the succession of night and day? At the appointed hour, the morning is ushered in, and the light gradually overspreads the horizon, and drives away the wicked from their deeds of darkness. Immediately the earth assumes a new form, as the wax from under the seal; and appears in fresh beauty, as arrayed in splendid garments. Thus the wicked are disappointed of their expected success, and are detected and crushed, notwithstanding their lawless pride and violence. But did Job command this beneficial and welcome change? Did it depend on his care and management? Nay, could he explain in what manner the sun, at so immense a distance, enlightened the earth? Or could he supply the want, should his beams be withheld; or command them to come when he pleased?

V. 16—18. The vast ocean covers immense treasures, and wonderful productions of the Creator. But had Job surveyed these repositories, or taken an inventory of their contents? Had he visited all the deep and dark caverns of the earth? Or was he fully acquainted with the nature and consequences of death, and with all which takes place in the invisible world? Nay, had he traversed the whole of the earth, so as to be able to shew its dimensions, and describe all the lands, climates, and creatures which it contains?

V. 19—21. Could Job fully explain the nature, and declare the origin, of light and darkness; what they are, and whence they come? Could he trace the streams of them back to the fountain, so as to visit their residence, and bring them forth to accomplish his own purposes? Or shew whither the light retired during the night; and point out the abode of darkness after the approach of the sun? Was he born before the present order was established? and had long observation made him acquainted with these matters, which to all else were incomprehensible? (Notes, Gen. i. 14—19. Deut. iv. 19. Ps. xix. 1—6. civ. 19—24. Is. xlv. 7.)—Though modern experiments have enabled men to form some theories concerning light and colours; yet how very little do the most scientific men yet know about them, of what they are, and how they are!

V. 22—30. To convince Job of his ignorance, and of the unsearchable wisdom and knowledge of God, some other perplexing questions were proposed to him. The snow and hail seem to be brought forth out of a treasury. But had Job ever entered thither? Did he understand the manner of their production? or were they at his command? With them the Lord troubles and fights against his enemies, when he sees good: but could Job employ them in his own cause, after the same manner? Could he explain the way in which the "morning light is divided, and the “east” (or from the east), “scattered over the whole the clouds, as a water-course to convey the waters, above the firmament, to their appointed places, often attended by thunder and lightning; so that even the uncultivated parts of the earth were watered, and made to produce food and supply drink, for the beasts which inhabit them? Could any account be given of the formation of the rain, into larger or smaller drops? Was any one instrumental in the production of the dew, the ice, or the hoar-frost? Were not all these entirely the work of God, and inexplicable to man? Thus the course of rivers was arrested, the fluidity of the water changed, and covered as with a pavement of stone. (Notes, v. 8—10. xxxvi. 22—plays of the divine power, and only unnoticed because common.

V. 31—41. The different seasons of the year are marked out, by the relative situation of the fixed stars to the earth, and to the sun. But could Job prevent the effects of those constellations, which presided either over the genial spring, or the dreary winter? (Note, ix. 9—13.) Could he even explain how these effects are produced? If he felt his ignorance and weakness in this matter, let him learn to keep his proper place, and to leave the government of the world to its Creator.—Could he in a dry season command the clouds to water the earth from their abundance? Would they, or the lightnings, obey his orders, and execute his purpose? Was he the author even of his own scanty measure of wisdom and knowledge? Could he explain what thought was? Could he keep a register of the clouds and their contents, and of the commerce which they carried on?
Could he seal up those “bottles of heaven,” and prevent more rain from falling, “when the dust was “melted into a mass, and the clods were joined together?”

—Would he undertake to provide food for the lions? was not even this far beyond his power? Nay, he could not provide for the young ravens; when deserted or expelled from the nest, they by their natural call seem to cry unto God for food. (Notes, Ps. civ. 10, 11. 19—23. 27—30.
Matt. vi. 25—32.) In short, whatever Job considered, above or beneath, within or around him, he must perceive the infinite wisdom, knowledge, power, and goodness of God; and feel his own incapacity to discourse on such subjects, as he had presumptuously ventured on.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The condescension of the God of glory, in making himself known to sinful man for his humiliation, instead of executing vengeance upon him for his rebellion, demands our highest admiration, and our warmest gratitude: and the most tremendous method, by which he abases a sinner in the dust, should be acknowledged as the effect of his mercy; for it tends to comfort, and joy, and salvation.—
When the wisest of men presume to intrude into those “secret things which belong to God,” and to be “wise “above what is written,” they are sure to “darken coun“sel by words without knowledge,” and perhaps undesignedly to serve the cause of impiety, or scepticism:
so that numbers, who have been vain of their acute, learned, and accurate reasonings on mysterious subjects,
and who have been admired for their sagacity and judgment, will meet with such a rebuke from the Lord, as Job did, or rather one far more severe. We should then be very careful, in all our investigations, not to exceed our assigned limits; not to go out of our depth; nor to leave the friendly shore of the word of God, to launch into the immense ocean of infinities. Conscious of our ignorance, guilt, and weakness, it becomes us to speak with trembling humility and reverence, when the perfections, decrees, or operations of God are our subject: for “such knowledge “is too high for us, we cannot attain unto it.” (Note, Ps. cxxxix. 4—6.)—But indeed none of us are suitably impressed with awe of the infinite majesty of God: our appeals to him generally savour of presumption, and we should not be able to answer before him, as we are apt rashly to think we could.—Though he sometimes deigns to reason with his creatures, and to demonstrate his equity in his dealings with them; yet he more generally silences the arrogant objector, by a display of his infinite power, authority, and majesty, as more becoming the Sovereign of the world. Indeed, all nature proclaims his glory: no creature fully comprehends his works; but contemplation of them, with adoring and exulting praises, forms the delight of each intelligent being, in exact proportion to the extent of his powers, and the degree of his holiness. Thus, when the creation was finished, and appeared in all its beauty, “the morning-stars sang together, and all the “sons of God shouted for joy.” Yet they discover still brighter glories in the mysteries of redeeming love, into which especially “they desire to look” with ceaseless admiration: (Notes, Eph. iii. 9—12. 1 Pet. i. 10—12:) and, in proportion as the new creating-Spirit renders us like them in knowledge and holiness; we shall become capable of participating their exalted joys, and find pleasures of which we now have scarcely a conception.—But, in other things, the boasted knowledge of mankind is in fact a very small matter: the best informed perceive most of their own ignorance in every thing: none can fully understand the most common phænomena of nature; and after all the discoveries of modern times, they remain, in some respects, as inexplicable as ever.—Indeed, we are of yesterday; our days are passing away as a shadow: and a humble willingness to be taught of God, and to credit his “sure testimony,” as contained in the sacred oracles; with a diligent attention to our proper interest and duty, as fallen creatures under a dispensation of mercy, are infinitely preferable to all the learning of the schools. Not that learning should be depreciated; provided it be accompanied with humility, kept in its proper place, directed to its proper objects, and not allowed to interfere within the province of revelation and faith. Yet even in natural things man's scanty measure of knowledge avails him but little; for he still finds himself unable to effect those alterations, which might give him ease, or conduce to his comfort.—But, whatever the Lord doeth must be right; because he is infinite in wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. As the world was created, so it is governed by him, exactly as it should be. The contemplation of his wise and surprising contrivance, in the economy of nature, should silence all our objections to his providential dispensations, and teach us to desire, that he would choose and manage all for us as he pleases. His power, which formed and bounds the mighty ocean, and which is displayed wherever we turn our eyes, should remind the sinner of “the power of his wrath;” convince him how vain it will be to oppose his authority; and warn him without delay to seek pardon and reconciliation: and it should teach the believer to rejoice in his Friend and Protector; who can say to the proudest persecutors, to the severest trials, or to the hosts of hell, “Hitherto shall ye come, and no further: and here shall your proud rage be stayed.”

V. 12—41.

The innumerable creatures, varied almost infinitely, which God has formed, may teach us that the reasons of his conduct may be numerous, when we can discern none. The revolutions of day and night, and of the seasons of the year, with all the profusion of bounty, with which they are crowned, and of which his enemies richly partake, should encourage us to expect large blessings from his covenant-love in Jesus Christ, and to be followers of him in love to our enemies. And, as he feeds the lions, and the ravens which cry unto him, let us learn to ask and expect our daily bread from him. The constancy and exactness, with which natural effects are produced, should remind us of the faithfulness of the Lord's promises, and the immutability of his counsel; and excite us to be constant and exact in our course of daily worship and obedience. The consideration of his all-sufficiency and eternity should teach us to choose his favour, as our portion and blessedness for ever: and every view which we take of his manifested perfections, is suited to convince us of his right to our love and obedience, of the evil of sinning against him, and of our need of his mercy and salvation. The humiliating recollection of our comparative insignificance should check our pride and presumption, and lay us low in reverential fear and self-abasement.—It would be in vain for us to command the clouds to rain, or to attempt to stay these “bottles of heaven;” but if we call upon the Lord in our necessities or fears, he will regulate all these things for our good. In fine, the more we contemplate these discoveries of our God, the more we are confounded with their vastness and variety. All his ways are in wisdom: every thing will concur to ruin his obstinate enemies; but all things work together for good to them that love him.

cularly illustrative of the power, wisdom, and manifold works of God: and the questions proposed concerning them, were suited to convince Job how little he knew or could do. The several species of the wild goats, and hinds, are continued from age to age; but not by the care of man. He does not know how long they go with young, or at what time they will bring forth; nor if he did, could he in any way tend on them or assist them, as he can the domestick animals. Though they bring forth their young with difficulty and pain, yet they need no human help: they soon forget their sorrows; and their young being active and vigorous, are in a short time able to shift for themselves, by entering into the corn-fields, as well as the pastures and meadows, notwithstanding the precautions of the owner.

V. 5—8. Some animals are evidently created for labour; others scorn the yoke: the tame ass is formed for a patient drudge; but the wild ass cannot be thus managed and employed. (Notes, xi. 7—12. Gen. i. 26, 27. ix. 1, 2. xvi. 12.) He has liberty as it were by charter: the barren wilderness is his residence, and its scanty productions his subsistence: yet it would be vain to attempt enticing him into populous cities, for the sake of a more plentiful support; or rendering him obedient to a driver's voice. But who gave him this liberty? Did not the Lord? And would Job suppose that he had not wise reasons for so doing? And as no human power can alter the nature of this animal, or render him serviceable to man; so it is equally impossible to alter the appointments of God, whether we are satisfied with them or not.

V. 9—12. The rhinoceros (which is generally supposed to be here intended,) is possessed of immense strength; (Marg. Ref. h. Note, Num. xxiii. 22;) and might perform proportionable labour, if he could be made to bear the yoke as the passive ox does. Yet Job was not so absurd as to expect this from him; nor would he depend on his assistance to plough his land, or gather in his harvest: knowing that it would be vain and dangerous, to attempt any thing of this kind with so powerful and fierce a creature. But was it not far more perilous to quarrel with the allotments of the Almighty?

V. 13—18. The Creator has divided his gifts among his creatures as he saw good; and in this, and in every other thing, his will and wisdom should be implicitly submitted to. To the peacock he has given most beautiful plumage; but it is not remarkable for any thing else.—The ostrich has wings and feathers; but it is vastly larger than other birds, and unable to mount aloft on its wings. (Marg.) It is likewise remarkable for its stupid insensibility in various respects. The female bird prepares no nest for her eggs; but lays them upon the earth, to be warmed by the heat of the sun, and that of the sand or dust, without any further attention. She has no instinctive remembrance that they are liable to be trodden on and destroyed by man or beast: she is as regardless of her eggs and young, as if they did not belong to her; and is destitute of care and fear about them. For God has not imparted to her that instinctive wisdom, which he has to other creatures in this particular. But when she is alarmed for her own safety, she uses her wings to assist her in running, and in this manner exceeds in swiftness the fleetest animals which have no wings; and when pursued by those who attempt to take her, she seems to despise both the horse and his rider.

V. 19—25. This description of the horse has been universally admired, as inimitably sublime. It especially relates to those horses, which are used in war; and in which the eastern countries have always excelled.—God alone has given the war-horse his strength and courage: (Note, Ps. cxlvii. 10, 11:) the flowing mane, which clothes his neck, adds to the fierceness of his appearance, and seems to indicate his triumph. (Note, Ps. xciii. 1, 2.) When going to the battle, he cannot be made afraid, or driven back, like the puny grass-hopper: the snorting of his nostrils, by which he bids defiance to his enemies, is dreadful. He paws with his feet, as if he would tear up the earth in his impatience to engage: he glories and exults in his strength, and in going out to meet the armed men: in his eagerness to start, and his fierceness and rage for the fight, he, as it were, devours the intervening space. He can scarcely wait for the signal for the battle, or stand still, because of his impatience; and he deems the dreadful alarm of the trumpet a joyful sound: he has an instinctive sense of the battle, at a distance; and is all on fire to rush amongst the captains, who with terrific shouts are marching to the assault.—Yet is this fierce intrepid animal easily subjected to man, made to fear the touch of the whip, or spur, obey the motion of the bridle, or even the voice of the rider, and almost that of a child! So wonderfully has God formed and fitted him for the service of man! (Note, Gen. ix. 1, 2.)

V. 26—30. The hawk is remarkable for the force with which it flies, and the skill with which it takes its prey; but did Job communicate to it those capacities by his wisdom?—The species of hawk here meant is supposed to have removed southward at stated periods, for the sake of a warmer climate.—In like manner, the eagle, which is remarkable for soaring higher than any other bird, and for building her nest in the most inaccessible situations, utterly disregards man's command. From her towering heights she seeks her prey; and by her most piercing sight sees it at a great distance, and darts down upon it in a moment. Thus her young are trained up to suck the blood of the prey; and she resorts where the dead bodies of man or beast abound. (Note, Matt. xxiv. 26—28.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18.

The infinite power, wisdom, and goodness of God are legible in all the variety of his creatures: "He openeth his hand, and satisfieth the desire of every living thing," and watches over them all with constant attention. Such as have no help from man, are taken care of, as well as those which have; and in like manner his people will surely be provided for and protected, either by, or without, the instrumentality of their fellow-creatures. Every species of animals reminds us of our ignorance and impotence: they continue as God has created them, and we can neither understand whence their different propensities arise, nor yet alter them: we often can derive no benefit from them; nay, some of them seem a nuisance to us, nor can we know for what purpose they were created. Yet we should acknowledge the wisdom of God, and submit to his will: we ought to be thankful for the benefit derived from some, and to be patient under the inconveniences occasioned by others: and we may learn from them, to confide in his kind providence, and to aim to answer the end of our creation.—Liberty is most valuable; yet the savage licentious freedom of the half-starved wild ass is not enviable. It is more desirable to be subject to wholesome laws, to labour, to be useful, and to live in plenty; than to set authority at defiance, and to live an indolent, unserviceable, and penurious life. In like manner, strength and power are valuable only when well employed: and the patient ox is preferable to the untameable rhinoceros: for one talent improved is far better than many misemployed.—It is very absurd for rational creatures to be vain of personal beauty, strength, courage, agility, or external decorations; when they are eclipsed in them all by the various species of brutes. God has better endowments to confer on those whom he loves: and if he do not impart wisdom and grace, all the rest will prove a snare and a curse.—It is lamentable to observe, that many human beings are more stupid, and hardened against their young, than the very ostrich, the disgrace of the animal tribes. They willingly forget their wants, dangers, and interests: and in order to be at liberty for dissipated pleasures, consign them even when helpless infants to the care of hirelings, and refuse them the very nutriment, which God has created for them! They afterwards take no care of their welfare, either in this world or in the next, any more than if they did not belong to them: and thus their unavoidable labour and pain become vain, and to bad purpose, for want of subsequent attention, and precaution about them; and by reason of the bad examples which they set, and the pernicious instructions which they give them. Surely "God," in judgment, "hath deprived" such parents "of wisdom," "and hath not imparted to them understanding." But we may cease to wonder at this, when we consider how stupidly insensible most men are to the interests of their own souls, which they neglect more fatally than the ostrich does her young. By their contemptuous defiance or forgetfulness of God, or their vain attempts to hide or excuse their sins, they plainly shew that he has judicially deprived them of understanding.

V. 19—30.

Man, by nature, is prone to imitate the animals in their worst qualities. Like the wild ass he scorns the yoke of God; and like the wild bull in the net, he rages against his corrections. Even his courage is generally unreasonable, instinctive, and furious, like that of a horse. His feet are swift to shed blood, or to venture his own life, when ambition, avarice, or revenge inspires him. In this case he "mocketh at fear" in his fierceness and rage; and not only rushes upon the weapons of death, but upon the divine vengeance, without hesitation. Yet would he be afraid as the grass-hopper, if called to prefer his plain duty towards God, his family, and society, to the caprice of fashion, and the diabolical honour of revenge, in the midst of the ridicule and reproach of ungodly men! How would he then act, if called to venture or lay down his life, in the despised cause of truth and righteousness? Moreover, men naturally glory in their own strength and prowess, and rejoice in ostentatiously displaying them; and are more disposed to seek renown by rendering themselves terrible, than by becoming useful.—The qualities of the horse, when united with his docility and promptitude to labour, are admirable; but when found in a rational creature, and separated from more useful dispositions, they become dreadful and detestable.—Even the eagles, which teach their young to suck up the blood, do not prey upon their own species; they leave that cruelty to man. Yet from each of these animals we might learn useful lessons: they almost all instruct us to attend to our own safety, and that of our offspring; and to secure ourselves, in some effectual refuge, from the dangers to which we are exposed. But God forbid, that we should be like the eagle only in soaring aloft and in keenness of sight, while we still look down to the earth for our prey, by ambition and worldly sagacity; or by using our religious knowledge, and our credit among Christians, to cloke ambition, covetousness, and worldly lusts! But, reverencing the divine Majesty, and abasing ourselves before him in deep repentance, may we by faith and love mount upwards as on eagles' wings, till we obtain "those things which are" "above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God."

NOTES.

CHAP. XL. V. 1, 2. It is probable, that the voice from the whirlwind ceased for a short space, that Job might speak, if he could make any reply; but, as he continued silent, God answered his very thoughts, and in few words shewed him what he intended by his multiplied questions. Job had complained of the Lord's dispensations, as if he meant to "contend with him;" (Notes, xxiii. 3—7. xxxi. 35—37 :) but could Job give him any instructions how to govern the world? Did he think it wise to contend with omnipotence? or, having arraigned the dispensations of his Maker, would he also presume to answer what had been spoken?—Or, "Does he who contends with the Almighty, "draw back?" E. Smith.—By a trivial change of the vowel points, this rendering may be admitted.

V. 3—5. At length Job ventured to speak; but not with that confidence which he had previously thought of. His friends had attempted to prove too much, and had only emboldened him in self-vindication: Elihu had reproved him with sharpness, and he had submitted to it. But the voice of God, and the declaration of his glorious perfections, and manifold works of wisdom and power, effectually convinced him of his rashness and irreverence, in speaking of God as he would have spoken of his equal. In this comparison, he perceived and acknowledged, that he was "vile;" a poor, mean, foolish, sinful creature, who ought not to have uttered one word reflecting upon the divine conduct. He was astonished at his own presumption, and could find nothing to plead in excuse: he would therefore be silent, in submission to the will and righteousness of God; having already spoken too often, and in a very unbecoming manner. (Notes, ix. 14—21. x. 3. xvi. 17—22. xlii. 1—6.)

humbled, the Lord again addressed him in the same majestic and awful manner as before, requiring his attention and his answer: and he more expressly reproved him for insisting upon his own righteousness, in such a manner as to seem to his friends, and even to Elihu, to charge God himself with injustice. Did he then require that the divine decrees respecting him should be reversed, because they had been too severe? Or, that the Lord should be deemed unjust in his judgments, rather than that he himself should be suspected of hypocrisy? Indeed, wicked men often murmured against Providence in this blasphemous manner; but would Job copy their example, and charge God foolishly? (Notes, ii. 10. xxxiv. 5—9. 31—37. xxxv. 1—3. 14—16. xxxvi. 22—33.) Would he allow his tongue such liberty, while vindicating himself from unjust accusations, or complaining of his sufferings, and the wrongs which were done him? Yet this had been the tendency of many expressions, which he had used in the heat of dispute, and in the bitterness of his soul. (Note, vi. 26.)

V. 9—14. The Lord would not at all deign to argue the question of right with his servant; but insisted on that being taken for granted. “Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?” (Notes, Gen. xviii. 23—26. Jer. xii. 1—4.) He purposed therefore to induce Job’s unreserved submission, by making him sensible, that he was acting most absurdly and presumptuously, in attempting to decide on the conduct of the infinitely glorious God. (Notes, x. 3. xxvii. 2—6.) Let him then consider whom he was offending: let him compare his puny arm with omnipotence, or his feeble voice with the tremendous thunder; and then let him enquire, whether he was able to make his cause good against such an Adversary? (Note, 1 Cor. x. 18—22.) But, ere he ventured any further, let him make trial of his strength against the most potent of his fellow men. Let him collect all his forces, assume all royal authority and majesty, and appear upon a glorious throne, arrayed with every magnificent decoration, and all the insignia of royalty: let him then declare his fiery indignation against every one of the proud tyrants and oppressors of the earth, and issue out his orders, that they should all be abased and trodden down, wherever they lived; that their faces should be covered as condemned criminals, and that they should either be put to death, or confined in dark and noisome dungeons. (Note, Esth. vii. 8.) And when, with a look or a word, he had effected this work, (as the Lord did in his own time and manner;) then it should be allowed that he had power sufficient to be his own deliverer and protector, though still unable to contend with the Almighty.

V. 15—24. There have been various opinions concerning behemoth: but probably the most ancient is the most true; namely, that the elephant is intended. The word is often used for quadrupeds in general; and more frequently for cattle, or animals which feed on vegetables, as distinguished from the carnivorous animals. This, however, is not exclusively the case: but probably it cannot be clearly shewn ever to mean any other than land animals, of which the elephant is the largest and most remarkable. It is also unlikely that the elephant should be totally omitted in this enumeration; and the several particulars best accord with it.—The Lord reminded Job, that he had made behemoth “with him;” both were his creatures, and behemoth is often found near the habitations of men.—This immense animal “eateth grass as an ox;” for if he devoured flesh as a lion, he could scarcely be either resisted or satisfied. The strength of his loins and the sinews of his body are equal to his bulk; and it is known that the elephant often carries on his back a large wooden tower, with several men in it. His trunk, (for the original word may mean either extremity of the body,) is very large, strong, and flexible, and by it he bears all down before him, as by the moving of a cedar. The “sinews of his thighs,” (as some suppose the word to mean,) are so interwoven, as to contribute very much to his vast strength; and his bones are so hard and firm, that they are like iron or brass. He is “the chief of all the works of God;” that is, of this kind. Now it is evident, that the elephant surpasses all other quadrupeds in size, strength, sagacity, and longevity; and yet is equally remarkable for his gentleness, when not provoked. He is content to feed upon the herbage of the mountains; and the other beasts play around him without dread of harm. He lies down to rest, not in a den as carnivorous animals generally do, but under the shade of the trees, or among the reeds and rushes, as fearless of any assailant. When he drinks, he seems as if he would empty a river; and makes no haste, not being in the least fear. He appears to be confident, that he could drink up Jordan at once: he greedily looks to the water when he is thirsty, and will not be kept from it by any impediments or snares; but removes them all by his trunk, which is situated above his nose.—Probably, it was not become customary at that time to take, tame, and employ elephants in war or in journeying, as has since been done. But, though man did not know how to deal with behemoth, the Creator had him entirely in his power, and could destroy him at his will. This thought was suited to remind Job not to contend against his omnipotent Sovereign.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

It behoves us to speak with great reverence and caution concerning the ways and works of God: for it will appear at length, that many of our expressions sprang from such corrupt principles, and led to such desperate conclusions, that we could not on reflection do otherwise than unreservedly condemn them. Yet all our words must be given an account of at the day of judgment, and be produced as evidences of the frame of our hearts: and, probably, it will then appear, that the presumptuous cavils and objections of philosophick speculators, sprang from deeper enmity against God, and were more provoking to him, than the scandalous profligacy of the profane and licentious. Indeed, when we murmur under correction, do we not contend with God, and dictate to him how he ought to deal with us? But can we seriously think, that creatures so weak and rebellious have any right to be consulted, or are qualified to instruct, or authorized to reprove, the Almighty? We should therefore now "judge ourselves" on this account, "that we may not be judged of the Lord."—Every increasing discovery of the glorious perfections of God will proportionably humble us in the dust before him. One clear and distinct view of his holy majesty would appal the stoutest rebel upon earth; or even drive him to despair, if not tempered with discoveries of his mercy. How then will the wicked bear the blaze of his glory at the approaching day of wrath and judgment?—Even believers have but faint apprehensions of his glory: and if they saw it more clearly, their self-complacency, in disputing with each other, would be turned into self-abhorrence; their mouths would be stopped, or only opened to say, "Behold, I am vile!" The subjects of their controversies, their management of them, and their whole characters, would appear in another light; and they would impose silence upon themselves, not knowing what to answer, and aware of having already spoken far more than they can justify.—But when we see this glory of our

God "in the face of Jesus Christ," we are humbled without being terrified; and our deepest reverence and self-abasement consist with filial confidence and love. When we clearly perceive how vile we are, we are ashamed and grieved for many of those words and actions, which before we vindicated; and when we truly repent, we retract what has been improperly spoken, and sincerely purpose and attempt a change in our conduct and conversation.—The progressive renewal of a believer proceeds in the same way of conviction, humiliation, and watchfulness against remaining sin, as his first conversion did. If we have been much humbled before God, we need still deeper humiliation; if convinced of many evils in our conduct, we need convincing of many more; and every progressive step in this way makes us more and more sensible, that we, in no case, have either right or reason to complain. Even when we protest against ill-treatment from men, or vindicate ourselves from injurious charges, we are apt to reflect upon God; and to be so tenacious of our own right or reputation, as to neglect a proper regard to his honour, and we frequently seem as if we would "disannul his judgment, and condemn him, that we may be righteous."

V. 9—24.

The proud, stout, and profane words of sinners, might almost induce us to conclude, that they suppose themselves to have "an arm like God," and "can thunder with a voice like his!" yet they are exposed without the least defence to his almighty vengeance. Nor can words express their madness, in persisting in rebellion, and neglecting his invitations to be reconciled.—Alas! what is all the majesty, excellency, glory, or beauty, with which sinful worms can deck themselves? How impotent their rage! How vain their ostentation. The Lord alone can, and he certainly will, abase every one that is proud; either in true repentance, or as condemned criminals in destruction. And those who proudly trust, that their own right hand, their own contrivances, efforts, or merits, can save them, will be numbered among these enemies and rivals of God.—Our consideration of the power, and our dread of the rage, of the beasts of the field, might teach us the folly of resisting the will, or provoking the indignation, of the Lord. Every haughty rebel should be reminded, that he who made him can "make his sword to approach unto him;" and not only to destroy his temporal life, but to fill his soul with unutterable anguish. Against him all power is vain; none can break through his snares, or out-brave his vengeance; though they drink down iniquity like water, and still covet and thirst for more, and make no haste to "flee from the wrath to come."—But, on the other hand, we may note, that it is well when the powerful are gentle and equitable; and love to see their inferiors secure, at liberty, and in comfort around them; and when, content with the provisions appointed for them, they do not injure, oppress, or defraud any one.—The all-bountiful Creator can Supply

NOTES.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1—11. It has been much disputed what we are here to understand by Leviathan. Many interpret it of the crocodile: but the crocodile is an inhabitant of rivers, and leviathan of the sea. (Notes, Ps. lxxiv. 13—17. civ. 25, 26. Is. xxvii. 1.) Others suppose the whale to be meant: yet naturalists find many difficulties, in applying the particulars of the description to that creature. But there are several species of whales which are known, and probably others in different parts of the ocean, with which we have but little acquaintance: and there is some reason to think that the deep contains enormous creatures, comprehended under that general name, which are even larger than any which have yet been taken. (Note, xxvi. 5—13.) As “behemoth” seems to denote the largest of the quadrupeds; so, it is probable, “leviathan” means the largest of the inhabitants of the ocean. Moses especially mentions the creation of great whales; (Gen. i. 21;)
and it is not likely that this animal, so particularly noted in the brief account of the creation, should be overlooked, when the Creator so copiously enumerated his works for the display of his own glory in them.—The Lord, in order more deeply to convince Job of his presumption in contending with him, demanded of him, whether he was able to subdue leviathan. Could he draw him out of the sea with a line and a hook, which might fasten through his tongue, nose, or jaws, after the various methods of taking other fishes? Could he bring this prodigious animal to yield, and become his supplicant, to speak him fair and court his favour? Could he engage him in a covenant to be his servant, and to labour for him? Or could he tame and confine him for the amusement of his family? Would he and his acquaintance make a feast upon his flesh? Or, if it were unfit for that use, would he divide the oil and bones among the merchants?—Perhaps in the days of Job, it was not thought possible to take whales as they now do:

but some of the species might have been cast on the shore, and divided for the use of different persons. It however served equally for Job’s humiliation, if he supposed it impossible to take them, as if it really had been so.—He was therefore directed to consider, whether he was able to wound leviathan in his body or head, with barbed irons, or fish-spears, and thus to take him? He was challenged to lay his hand on him if he dared: but should he attempt it, and escape with his life, he would remember his perilous situation so well, that he would not make another attempt. All hope of taking him would be vain: the very sight of him would daunt any man. None would dare to stir him up when asleep, or basking on the surface of the ocean; and who would dare to meet him when enraged?
How could Job then expect to prevail on his almighty Creator to alter his plan of government to please him, or to use his power to serve his interests, or humour his wayward inclinations? For where was that man, who had first given to the Lord and made him his debtor, that he should have a right to demand payment; when all things in the whole universe were the work and property of God?

V. 12—34. The remainder of this chapter contains a particular and most sublime description of leviathan.—
The Lord declared, that he did not mean, by confining this prodigious animal in the vast ocean, to conceal from man “his parts, and power, and comely proportion:” for, though we call such creatures monsters, and deem them uncomely, the Creator sees them to be formed in a suitable and becoming proportion of one part to another.—
At first sight leviathan appears exceedingly formidable:

and who can draw near to him, to examine particularly his whole skin, which serves as his garment; or to strip it off from him? Who would undertake to bridle him like a horse for his use? or to look into his mouth; when a sight of his teeth would make any man dread immediate destruction? The scales, or strong pieces of shields, (marg.) with which he is covered, as with an impenetrable coat of mail, are his confidence: by them he is secured, as if a seal fastened one part to another; so that no air can penetrate between them, no separation can be effected. When he “neeses,” or spouts the water into the air, his breath sparkles like fire, and his eyes appear like the morning-light; so that burning lamps and sparks, and smoke appear to be emitted from his mouth, as from under a furnace; and a flame seems to attend his breath, as if it would set coals on fire. His head is joined to his body with the most surprising strength: and it is as if sorrow, or fainting, marched before him, exulting in the havock which he makes of other creatures; or, however assaulted, his confidence in his own strength turns all his sorrows into joy. His muscles are immoveably firm; and his heart as incapable of fear or compassion, as if it were a mill-stone. When he appears above water, he causes such commotion and agitation in the waves, that the stoutest mariners are terrified, as in a furious storm; and betake themselves to confessions and prayers, expecting immediate death. (Notes, Ps. cvii. 23—30. Jon. i. 4—6. 11—16.) No weapons of war are of any avail: he is undaunted by them; they make no impression on him, or resistance to him; but he despises and derides them all. Indeed, he reclines his enormous weight upon the sharp-pointed stones at the bottom of the sea, with as much ease as if he lay on the soft mire. His motion in the deep makes the waters to move, as ointment in a pot over a vehement fire. His path may be tracked by this violent commotion, and by the white foam which he leaves upon the waters. In the whole earth there is no creature equal to him, being formed destitute of fear. He beholds every other animal, or the stately ships, and aspiring man, with contempt and disregard; he feels himself capable of ruling over the stoutest and proudest animals; and he has more strength and courage, than the children of pride, who exalt themselves against their Maker.—It is undeniable, that some particulars in this description, do not accord to any species of whale, which is at present known; for none of them are covered with scales, or have an impenetrable skin: but it agrees still less with any other creature that we know; and especially it is wholly unsuited to the crocodile.—The ancient fathers generally understood the passage as an emblematick, or typical, description of Satan, that “king over all the children of pride.” (Note, Is. xxvii. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Man was formed to be the lord of all other creatures here below; but his superiority consists principally in the powers of his rational nature, which, if duly improved, would teach him to submit to his Creator and to serve him: if therefore he irrationally forgets his place and duty, he should to present burnt-offerings for their sins, and submissively to engage Job to pray for them, 7, 8. They obey, and God accepts Job, 9. His prosperity is restored and doubled, 10—12. His children, 13—15. His age and death, 16, 17.

be reminded of his inferiority in other respects, even to many of the animals. Indeed, some of these are so powerful and formidable, that we are by no means able to cope with them: how mad then must the presumptuous transgressor be, who defies the power and wrath of the Almighty!—If language so sublime was proper in describing the terrible force of “leviathan;” what words can express the power of God's indignation, who “is a consuming fire!” He indeed beholdeth all high things in order to abase them; he resists, and will crush, all those who proudly exalt themselves against him; and “who may stand in his sight “when he is angry?” But he more delights in shewing his glory from the mercy-seat; and in encouraging sinners to take refuge “under the shadow of his wings,” and to prostrate themselves before him. If his anger be thus turned away from us, his omnipotence will be our protection; and then we need fear no enemy, though we shall have those, which are far more formidable than leviathan. Satan, the king and father of all the children of pride, with his legions of evil spirits, is not confined to the ocean; nor can he be fenced out or resisted by our puny arm. Our wisdom, strength, and resolution, are unavailing in this unequal contest; and far more useless than sword or spear against leviathan: all opposition or hope of overcoming or escaping, if left to ourselves, would be in vain; his heart is stoned against compassion, and he has been the cruel murderer of men, both body and soul, from the beginning: (Note, John viii. 41—47:) he rejoices in causing destruction; and he looks on all the proud and lofty of the earth as his own. But “the poor in spirit,” who humbly trust in the Lord's mercy, are safe: relying on their almighty Assistant, they may defy and resist this tremendous foe, and be made more than conquerors over him. They should however remember, that they are saved wholly by grace; “for who hath prevented the “LORD, that he should repay him?” And if they are mercifully rescued from the deserved wrath of God, and from the malice of Satan, they have no right to complain of any affliction or distress; or to boast of any wisdom, strength, or endowment of their own. Submission, dependence, and grateful obedience are their part; it behoves them to revere the divine Majesty; to be abased under a consciousness of their own vileness; to occupy their allotted place contentedly and obediently; to cease from their own wisdom, and to give all the glory to their gracious God and Saviour.—When any man becomes proud of his personal strength and courage, let him be reminded of leviathan: when he is vain of his sagacity, ingenuity, or mental endowments, let him consider how much Satan excels him in them all. Let us all consider the holiness of our God, that we may be ashamed of our remaining unholiness: and, remembering from whom every good gift comes, and for what end it was given, let us walk uprightly and humbly with the Lord; for “before honour “is humility.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XLII. V. 1—6. (Note, xl. 3—5.) Job, borne down as it were with a torrent of light and conviction, at length answered; not in his own vindication, but with unreserved submission. He was fully assured, that the Lord could do every thing; and therefore it was madness to contend with him, and folly to despair of help from him. He knew that none of his impatient thoughts could be concealed from God: or rather he meant, that the Lord could not be prevented from accomplishing every thing which he intended. (Marg.—Notes, Prov. xix. 21. Is. xlvi. 10, 11. Dan. iv. 34—37. Eph. i. 9—12.) He had allowed these truths before peevishly, (Note, xxiii. 13—17;) but he now acknowledged them with humble acquiescence, and not without hope of relief.—In reproof of his presumption, God had said, “Who is this, that darkeneth counsel by “words without knowledge?” (Notes, xxxviii. 1, 2.) And Job here, in indignant astonishment at his own presumption, repeats the sentiment, and pleads guilty to the charge; as if he had said, ‘Who indeed am I, a poor sinful worm, that I should venture to darken such deep subjects, by my ignorant and impatient discourses!’ He confessed that he had spoken things beyond his knowledge, and too wonderful, or mysterious, for him to comprehend; and in a manner which merited the severest punishment.—God had likewise commanded Job to prepare his answer while he proposed some questions to him, and blamed him for presuming to instruct the Almighty; (Notes, xxxviii. 3. xl. 1, 2. 6—8;) but Job now humbly besought the Lord, that he would condescend to answer the questions which he desired to propose, solve those difficulties with which he was perplexed, declare his truth unto him, and become his Instructor. He had indeed obtained some distant knowledge of God from education, instruction, and conference with his friends; and he had thought himself competent to discourse on such subjects; but the scene, which he had now witnessed, had made such discoveries to him of the divine glory, and had so affected his heart; that, compared with this intuitive knowledge, all that he ever knew before seemed to be like hearing a report of some absent person, or transaction. He was now far more sensible than ever of his own guilt and pollution: so that he “abhorred himself,” as an abominable sinner in heart and life; but especially for his presumption and impiety, in murmuring against God. (Notes, Ez. xvi. 60—63. xxxvi. 31, 32.) Of this and of all his sins he sincerely repented, and willingly took shame to himself for them: and, while he abased his body in “dust and ashes,” as a humble penitent; he desired to lie as low in self-condemnation, and in the frame of his spirit before God, casting himself wholly on his mercy, and submitting unreservedly to his will.—No doubt Job before this, had had spiritual and experimental knowledge of God in some measure; but nothing equal to what he received on this occasion. (Notes, i. 1. 8. 20—22. Is. vi. 5. Luke v. 1—11, latter part.)—‘This passage is totally unintelligible, as it stands in the Bible. Verses three and four seem to have crept in from the beginning of JEHOVAH’s address to Job.’ E. Smith. Accordingly this writer omits a great part of them. They are however found in the Hebrew, and in other versions, manuscripts, &c. Deciding in this peremptory manner on the word of God, is irreverent and dangerous in the extreme.

V. 7—9. While the Lord was speaking to Job with sharp rebukes, his friends perhaps thought him altogether wrong, and themselves blameless and commendable: and it is not unlikely, that some readers have been ready to conclude, while we have gone through the preceding chapters, that the discourses of Job have been too favourably, and those of his friends too unfavourably, explained. But this chapter was all along considered as the clue of the whole narration; without which it would have been presumptuous to decide positively, and without hesitation. It is however evident, that the general doctrine of Job was more honourable to God, and consistent with the truth, than that of his friends. They had misrepresented the dispensations of Providence, as if this world had been the state of retribution; and had greatly lost sight of the future state; they had considered extraordinary afflictions as a demonstration of wickedness, and as the effect of vindictive anger, rather than as trials and chastenings: and on this ground alone they had condemned a most eminent servant of God of hypocrisy, and atrocious iniquity, and treated him with severity and disdain; while he was enduring the severest sufferings, and struggling with violent temptations. (Notes, iv. 1—11. v. 3—5. 25—27. viii. 1—7. 20—22. ix. 22—24. xi. 1—4. 13—20. xv. 1—13. xviii. 2—4. xx. 1—9. xxii. 5—14. 21—30.) On the contrary, though Job had irreverently and impatiently vindicated himself; yet on the whole his sentiments were true, and his arguments conclusive.—When therefore the Lord had brought Job to deep repentance, and a proper frame of mind, he answered his confidence, and decidedly took his part. His friends, instead of a recompence for their service, as perhaps they expected, were informed that God was very angry with them, and would not forgive them; except they brought costly sacrifices as a confession of their guilt, and of their dependence on his mercy; and unless by proper concessions they induced Job to become their intercessor, and to pray for them, while they offered their burnt-offerings. Four times in two verses God called Job his servant, as if he gloried in him, in the midst of his poverty and distress, and when he was treated as a hypocrite. Him alone the Lord would accept, and his friends for his sake and in answer to his prayers; (Notes, Gen. xii. 1—3. Ez. xiv. 13—21;) otherwise he would severely chastise them, and put them to shame, according to their folly, in misrepresenting his dispensations, and condemning his servant.—The prosperity of those who were more guilty, and the afflictions of Job, who received this testimony of his superior piety, constituted a refutation of their whole doctrine.—Job, being himself humbled and pardoned, heartily and readily forgave them, and prayed for them; and they submitted to this humiliating expedient or making their peace with God. Thus a cordial reconciliation took place. Job’s character was cleared and honoured: and, if he were not an intended type of the Saviour, the whole history is suited to bring his sufferings and the event of them to our remembrance. (Note, Jam. v. 9—11.)

V. 10—17. While Job murmured, disputed, persisted in his own vindication, and spoke contemptuously of his friends; his afflictions continued, and the suspicions which evil that the LORD had brought upon him : ^b every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an ear-ring of gold.

^c 12 So the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning : for ^d he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses.

^e 13 He had also ^e seven sons and three daughters.

14 And he called the name of the first Jemima ; and the name of the second, Kezia ; and the name of the third, Keren-happuch.

15 And in all the land were ^f no women found so fair as the daughters of Job : and their father ^g gave them inheritance among their brethren.

16 After this lived Job ^h an hundred and forty years, ⁱ and saw his sons, and his sons' sons, even four generations.

17 So Job died, being old and ^k full of days.

his friends entertained of him were strengthened : but as soon as he submitted to God, repented and abhorred himself, and forgave and prayed for his false accusers ; the tide began to turn in his favour, and his character was re-established, and rendered more illustrious than ever. (Ps. xxxvii. 5—7.) Some think that the Chaldeans and Sabeans were wonderfully disposed to restore to him his substance. His afflictions, however, by which he had been held as in bondage or captivity, were terminated ; his reputation and honour were restored ; the permission given to Satan being recalled, (Notes, i. 12. ii. 6,) his health also was re-established, his spirits were calmed, and his comforts renewed. All his relations and neighbours, who before had treated him with disdain, on account of his poverty and supposed hypocrisy, now came around him : being either afraid of disregarding one who was a favourite of heaven, or desiring the benefit of his prayers and instructions, or through love and esteem. They condoled with him and comforted him ; and according to the custom of those times, every one of them made him a present of a piece of money, stamped with the figure of a lamb, (as the original word is supposed to imply,) and an ornament of gold for the ear, or face. He seems likewise to have been again acknowledged, and submitted to, as ruler, and in process of time his substance was in every thing exactly doubled. But, as a testimony that his children were not extinct, or lost to him by death, he had only the former number replaced to him ; which, with those who had been removed to another world, doubled them likewise. After this he lived in prosperity and honour, no less than one hundred and forty years ; probably above two hundred years in all : and, instead of being written childless, as he once feared, he saw his posterity to the fourth generation ; and at length died in peace, satisfied with living here, and ripe for a better world. Thus in every particular his integrity was evidenced by those very testimonies, which his friends had improperly demanded. His longevity is strong proof, that he lived at a very early period. (Note, v. 25—27.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The Lord will assuredly bring those whom he loves to adore him, in humble submission and self-abasement. Their corrections will continue, till they cease from murmuring, boasting, and censuring : but when they repent and kiss the rod, their deliverance draws nigh.—Clear discoveries of the glorious power and wisdom of God, even in the inanimate or irrational works of the creation, tend to humble our pride, and to induce us to subscribe to his rebukes, and to the charges which his word brings against us ; to fear his wrath above all things, and to expect every blessing from his favour. As none of his thoughts can fail of accomplishment, so none of ours can escape his notice, but must all be accounted for at the day of judgment.—Calm reflection will often convince us “ that we were hiding counsel by words without knowledge,” at the very time, when we thought, that we were fully declaring the truth in a clear and convincing manner : and grace in lively exercise will always influence us to confess without hesitation our sins, when we discover them ; and, without being much concerned to justify what was right, to take shame to ourselves for the things which have been faulty in our conduct.—Even the true believer, in discoursing of heavenly things, is very liable to go out of his depth ; and by uttering what he does not understand, and speculating on things too wonderful for him, he often exposes himself to rebukes for his rashness and irreverence. What then will be the case of the infidel, the sceptick, and the disputer of this world ? They will be speechless, and despair ; whilst all the world shall behold and acknowledge the wisdom, justice, and goodness of those laws, truths, and decrees, which they arraigned and blasphemed as unjust, oppressive, and unreasonable. Instead of citing the eternal God to the bar of a rebellious worm, and calling upon him to answer our rash objections ; it behoves us humbly to crave his instructions, and to be satisfied with the explanations, which he vouchsafes to give of those difficulties which intercept our path. For many hear of him, from parents and teachers, and learn to discourse of his works and ways, who have no heart-affecting, influential views of his perfections. After all they have heard, he is to them an unknown God ; for they do not so know him, as to reverence, love, trust, and submit to him. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxviii. 9. John viii. 54—59. xvi. 1—3. xvii. 1—3. 25, 26. Acts xvii. 22—31. Rom. i. 21—23. 28—32.) Nay, believers, who have some experimental acquaintance with God, may even in this world, receive such clear discoveries of his glory, and experience so much of his power and love ; that all which they knew before, shall seem as a mere report, compared with their present views. How then will it be, when we shall “ see him as he is,” and “ know him as we are known.”—All true knowledge of God proportionably humbles and abases us, and causes us "to abhor ourselves, and repent in dust and ashes;" but false doctrines and mere speculative knowledge puff men up, and feed their self-importance. By this criterion let us judge ourselves, and our knowledge in religion: let us take care not to be put off with empty notions; or to be satisfied with our present measure of humiliation and experience: for when we are the most abased as sinners before God, we are in the readiest way of being exalted by him. Did such self-abasing language suit the lips of Job, that most eminent saint and servant of God, at the moment when every grace was in its fullest exercise, and can any language be too humiliating for us? If we start and scruple to say that we "abhor ourselves;" or if we find that we cannot do it with sincerity, does it not demonstrate, that we have never perceived so much of the divine glory, as Job had, and therefore are not made so sensible of our own guilt and pollution? For it would be very arrogant for any of us to suppose ourselves better, by nature and practice, or more eminent in faith, patience, or piety, than this most approved and applauded character.

V. 7—17.

When the Lord has duly humbled and graciously pardoned his servants, he will clear their reputations, silence their slanderers, answer their confidence, and exceed their largest expectations; and he will also teach them, after his example, to forgive, love, and pray for those who have injured them. In this frame of spirit they will be prepared to bear honour in an unassuming manner, and then he will confer it. He generally first rebukes those whom he most loves: (Notes, v. 17. Heb. xii. 4—11. Rev. iii. 18, 19:) but let not such, as for a time escape, be too confident, for their turn will soon come.—Even pious men may kindle the wrath of God against themselves, by not speaking humbly and honourably of him: but as all his controversies with us begin by our sin; so every reconciliation must be effected, in that way which he has revealed, and in the use of those means which he has prescribed. They, who refuse to come in this way, shall be dealt with "after their folly;" but no true believer or real penitent will finally persist in such a refusal.—It is indeed very painful to be confuted, rebuked, and constrained to confess our mistakes and offences, and to beg the assistance and good offices of those, whom we have despised, condemned, and injured. Yet the true penitent will submit to all this and far more, when the will of God is known: his self-abasement will be proportioned to his former self-confidence; and whenever we approach God in his ordinances, such mutual concessions, restitutions, and forgivenesses should first be attended to. (Note, Matt. v. 23, 24.) Nothing cements the affections of believers, who have jarred or disputed, so much as praying with and for each other: when they enjoy communion with their common Saviour, they feel a more lively disposition to delight in 'the communion of the saints;' and to forget all which for a season interrupted it; and "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."—We should be careful not to judge any thing before the time; we know not how the Lord may clear up one man's character, or expose another's; and therefore we should be candid towards others, and jealous of ourselves. Neither are we competent to decide who is the most happy man; for the end crowns the day. (Note, Ec. vii. 8.) When a man is oppressed, censured, and tempted, he appears very different, from what he does when delivered and comforted: and he that is at ease, can scarcely conceive what effect sharp trials would have upon him.—Satan's prevalence is limited in duration, as well as in degree: and when he is rebuked, the gloom of those whom he has tempted will be dispelled, and way made for their returning consolations. (Notes, i. 9—12.) "When a man's ways please the LORD, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him:" (Note, Prov. xvi. 7:) he is graciously pleased with the very imperfect services of the humble believer; and when he has stood the trial, he shall come forth as gold purified from the furnace.—True religion mortifies that avarice which covets the wealth of other men, and that pride which induces many to scorn the needful, well meant, and proper assistance which is offered to them. (Note, Phil. iv. 10—13.)—Whether the Lord gives us health, long life, affluence, friends, and flourishing families, or not; we shall eventually be happy, if we patiently suffer according to his will: and those things, which once we thought were altogether against us, shall at length appear to have been wisely chosen for our greater and more enduring good. (Note, James i. 12.)—We know not for what good purposes our lives may be prolonged; and therefore should not be impatient for death, even when greatly afflicted. And whether our children and friends go before, or follow us, into the eternal world, they will not be lost to us, if the Lord has made them partakers of his grace: this, above all things we should seek, for an inheritance for them and for ourselves; being infinitely more valuable than all the wealth, honour, and personal accomplishments in the world.—But though Job's trials and their happy event are replete with instruction and consolation, to the suffering and tempted believer; yet we shall be still more edified and encouraged by looking unto Jesus. His abasements, temptations, and sufferings were vastly greater than those of Job; he endured them with perfect patience; and they issued far more gloriously. For us he was tempted, and suffered, and triumphed, and is glorified: for us, when we were enemies, he offered himself a Sacrifice, and now for us he pleads before the throne. In him believers are pardoned and accepted: "He sees his seed, and prolongs his days, and the pleasure of the LORD prospers in his hands;" but there is no salvation in any other. (Note, Is. liii. 9—12.) To him we must come, in him we must confide, to him we must submit, and from him receive all that we can want: but we can give him nothing, except the honour of our whole salvation, and ourselves to be, by his grace, his redeemed and devoted servants. May we then experience his grace, share his victories, tread in his steps, and copy his patience; and we shall find in the "event, that the Lord is pitiful, and of tender mercy."—But "we have need of patience, that after having done the will of God, we may receive the promise." (Heb. x. 36.)

P S A L M S.

THE Hebrew name of this book in the original is (תהלים) Praises: because the praises of God form its grand scope and object, to which all other subjects contained in it are, in one way or another, rendered subservient.—The word Psalms is taken from the Greek, and denotes that these sacred hymns were, when sung, accompanied with the psaltery, harp, or lute: and indeed, from the time of David, psalmody, with various kinds of instrumental musick, formed a considerable part of the daily worship at the sanctuary. (Notes, 1 Chr. ix. 33. xv. 16—22. xvi. 4—6. 37—43. xxv.)—The whole collection is often called, ‘The Psalms of David.’ He indeed was undoubtedly the writer of the greatest part of them: his name is prefixed to above seventy Psalms; and he certainly wrote some, and probably many, of those which are not expressly ascribed to him. Concerning others, it remains doubtful who composed them; but one, the ninetieth, is entitled, “The Prayer of Moses, the Man of God;” and there is internal proof that some were written long after the time of David, and even during, or subsequent to, the Babylonish captivity. David however, as the first who especially employed his poetical talents, by the guidance of the Holy Spirit, in composing sacred poems, and who established or regulated the psalmody at the Sanctuary, was warranted to call himself “the sweet Psalmist of Israel:” and to add, “the Spirit of the LORD spake by me, and his word was in my tongue.” (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1—4.)—Josephus informs us, that the Levites were enjoined to preserve at the temple, all such hymns as might be composed in honour of God: and it is thought by some learned men, that the book of Psalms which we now have was selected from a much larger number, as divinely inspired, and therefore admissible into the canon of Scripture; while many others were rejected, as not entitled to this honourable distinction. However this may be, the entire book has certainly been considered as a part of “the oracles of God” in every age, by an invariable testimony. St. Paul quotes the second Psalm expressly as a prophecy of Christ; (Acts xiii. 33;) which implies that the Psalms were then arranged after the same order, in general, as they now are. Nearly fifty of the Psalms are quoted, or referred to, in the New Testament. Our Lord, proposing a question to the Scribes concerning the Messiah, introduces a passage from the hundred and tenth Psalm, in this manner: “David himself said by the Holy Ghost ;” and “David in Spirit calleth him Lord:” and when instructing his disciples, after his resurrection, he says: “All things must be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me.” (Notes, Matt. xxii. 41—46. Mark xii. 35—37. Luke xxiv. 44—49.) In like manner, the apostle Paul, quoting a passage from the ninety-fifth Psalm, which he ascribes to David, uses this language; “Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day, if ye will hear his voice.” (Notes, Heb. iii. 7—13. iv. 3—11.) The assembled Christian church also applies the second Psalm to Christ, in these words: “Lord, thou art God, . . . who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said.” (Note, Acts iv. 23—28. In so decided a manner is the divine inspiration of the Old Testament attested by Christ and his apostles.—The Jewish writers indeed are unwilling to bestow on David the title of prophet, and ascribe to him only a subordinate kind of inspiration, according to the several distinctions which they have devised in this respect: but St. Peter expressly calls him a prophet; (Acts ii. 30;) and the number and clearness of the predictions which he delivered, and which were evidently fulfilled after many ages, most fully prove him entitled to that character. Indeed, the several particulars respecting the descent, kingdom, and priesthood of Christ, the contempt and persecutions which he endured, and the intenseness and variety of his sufferings, the manner of his death, his resurrection, ascension, and glory, with the success of his gospel, and the calling of the Gentiles, are so circumstantially foretold in one or other of the Psalms, that a history of these events might in great measure be compiled from them; and in some cases, with a minuteness to which historians seldom descend.—The words which our Lord used on the cross, in two instances, were taken from the Psalms; and the insulting language of his persecutors was the very same as David, above a thousand years before, had put into their mouths. (Notes, Ps. xxii. 1. 7, 8. xxxi. 5. Matt. xxvii. 39—46. Luke xxiii. 46.)—Many Psalms indeed are, directly and throughout, prophecies of Christ; various passages in others must be interpreted of him: and David was so eminent a type of the Saviour, that his very name, in some instances in the prophecies, is given to this his most illustrious descendant. (Ez. xxxvii. 24, 25. Notes, Is. lv. 1—5. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31. Hos. iii. 4, 5.) But besides this, that union, which subsists between the Redeemer and his people, and the conformity thence resulting, are of such a nature, that it is impossible the same things should not apply in many respects to both, though a discrimination must needs be observed in others. This may lead us to an obvious decision of the controversy, which has often been agitated; whether all the Psalms should be applied to Christ, or not. No doubt every pious mind will allow, that each of them either immediately points to him in his Person, character, and offices; or may be so applied as to lead the believer's thoughts to Him, who is the centre of all acceptable religion: and probably there are few persons, who suppose that all the Psalms speak of Christ in exactly the same manner; but rather according to the nature of the subject. It cannot indeed be doubted, that the Psalms in general are devotional and experimental, the language of the pious heart under its various exercises; whether mourning for sin, thirsting after God, or rejoicing in him; whether burdened with affliction, struggling with temptation, or triumphing in the hope or enjoyment of deliverance; whether admiring the divine perfections, thanking God for his mercies, meditating on his truths, or delighting in his service. They are in great measure a divinely appointed standard of genuine experience, by which we may judge whether, or how far, our own desires, aims, fears, hopes, joys, and sorrows, are spiritual; and how far they are carnal, or verge to enthusiasm or delusion. The value of the Psalms in this particular is inestimable; and the more cordially we can enter into the views and appropriate the language of the Psalmist, the higher is our progress in genuine religion. 'The Psalms are an epitome of the Bible, adapted to the purposes of devotion. They treat occasionally of the creation and formation of the world, the dispensations of Providence, and the economy of Grace; the transactions of the patriarchs; the Exodus of the children of Israel, their journey through the wilderness, and settlement in Canaan; their law, priesthood, and ritual; the exploits of their great men, wrought through faith; their sins and captivities; their repentances and restorations; the sufferings and victories of David; the peaceful and happy reign of Solomon; the advent of Messiah, with its effects and consequences; his incarnation, birth, life, passion, death, resurrection, ascension, kingdom, and priesthood; the effusion of the Spirit; the conversion of the nations; the rejection of the Jews; the establishment, increase, and perpetuity of the Christian church; the end of the world; the general judgment; the condemnation of the wicked, and the final triumph of the righteous with their Lord and King. These are the subjects here presented to our meditation. . . . They are . . . adorned with the figures and set off with the graces of poetry; and poetry itself is designed yet further to be recommended by the charms of musick, thus consecrated to the service of God; that so delight may prepare the way for improvement, and pleasure become the handmaid of wisdom, while every turbulent passion is calmed by sacred melody, and the evil spirit is still dispossessed by the Harp of the son of Jesse.' Bp. Horne's Preface to his Commentary on the Psalms, third edit. 8vo. Oxford, 1781, pp. i, ii.—'They present religion to us in its most engaging dress; communicating truths, which philosophy could never investigate, in a style which poetry can never equal; while history is made the vehicle of prophecy, and Creation lends all its charms to paint the glories of Redemption.' Ibid. p. lxiv.—'Besides their incomparable fitness to express our sentiments, they are at the same time memorials of, and appeals to, former mercies and deliverances; they are acknowledgments of prophecies accomplished.' Ibid. p. xxviii.—In commenting therefore upon this book, we should continually keep the Saviour in our mind: and while we consider who he was, and what he did; how and why he suffered, and how he rose and reigns; we should also endeavour to learn what his true disciples are, what they ought to be, and what they actually do aspire after. The literal meaning, as far as the Psalmist is concerned, should be adverted to, where it can be ascertained; the particulars noted, in which Christ is predicted or typified; and the use that is to be made of every part of each Psalm to encourage the faith and hope, to direct the temper and conduct, to enliven the devotions, and to assist the self-examination of the reader, should be plainly shewn.—We are also here continually reminded of what we must have to struggle against, from within and from without, and how we may succeed in this conflict: and solemn warnings, and denunciations of vengeance against oppressors and persecutors, and the despisers and opposers of Christ and his gospel, are every where interspersed. This indeed has been considered as an objection to the use of the Psalms, in publick or private devotion; and a prejudice has arisen in some pious minds against several parts of them, as if contrary to the Christian spirit: but, doubtless, the right spirit has always been the same; and these parts must be considered, either as direct prophecies, or as divinely inspired declarations of the certain doom awaiting all the opposers of Christ, and his cause or people; and not as expressions of private resentment, or malevolence against injurious individuals. In short, there is nothing in true religion, doctrinal, experimental, and practical, but will present itself to our attention, while we meditate upon the Psalms: scarcely any part of the book, which, when properly understood and accommodated, will not be found to suit the case of private Christians, and which may not be usefully employed in publick worship: hardly an occasion of praise and thanksgiving can be conceived, to which some portion of them, faithfully rendered in poetical versions, may not be applied with peculiar energy and propriety; and indeed the Christian's use of them in the closet, and the minister's in the pulpit, will generally increase, with their growing experience of the power of true religion in their own hearts. From this eulogium on this part of Scripture, let the reader be excited to meditate on it carefully for himself: but let him not expect too much from the expositor. Brevity must be consulted; a writer's inclination may exceed his ability; and at last, the teaching Spirit of God, sought in fervent prayer, leading the pious soul into the genuine exercise of faith, hope, love, and gratitude, will do more to enable a man to enter into the Psalmist's views, than any human explication. If the author is enabled to suggest a few profitable hints upon each Psalm, he shall have cause to be very thankful.

Various divisions of this book have been made, apparently without much reason. The present order seems to have been very ancient, though by no means coincident with the date of the several Psalms, which indeed have seldom much connexion with each other.—Various other particulars respecting the title, the date, and the occasion of each Psalm, will be noted as we proceed.—'The version of the Psalms, in our Bible, which was made by the translators employed by James the First, is posterior to that printed in our prayer books, which was executed in 1539. This last as very excellent, and familiarized by custom, was retained in the Liturgy; though, as translated chiefly from the Septuagint, it does not so exactly correspond with the original, as does that in our Bibles.' Grey's Key. Indeed the Prayer-book translation is in no respect comparable to the Bible translation.

PSALM I.

The character and happiness of the righteous, 1—3.
The misery and ruin of ungodly men, 4—6.

BLESSED is the man that ^b walketh not in ^c the counsel of the ^{*} ungodly, nor ^d standeth in ^e the way of sinners, nor ^f sitteth in the seat of the ^g scornful.

2 But ^b his delight is in the law of the LORD: and in his law doth he ^c meditate ^d day and night.

3 And he shall be like ^a a tree planted by the rivers of water, that ^m bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also ⁿ shall not ^o wither; and ^p whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

4 The ungodly are not so: but are ^p like the chaff which the wind driveth away.

5 Therefore the ungodly ^q shall not stand in the judgment, nor ^r sinners in the congregation of the righteous.

6 For the LORD ^s knoweth the way of the righteous: but ^t the way of the ungodly shall perish.

NOTES.

PSALM I. V. 1—3. This psalm is generally considered as a preface to the book, and supposed to have been prefixed to it by Ezra. (Notes, Ezra vii. 6—10. Neh. viii. 1, 2.) It establishes the important distinction between the righteous and the wicked; and assures us of the felicities of the former, and the misery of the latter.—All men shun misery, and aim to be happy: but few understand that misery springs from sin, and that happiness can be enjoyed only in the favour of God. This the Scriptures declare; and by this light the believer seeks and finds, what he would otherwise seek in vain. In such portions of the word of God, we ought not to look for the way in which sinners are made righteous; or for the origin of that difference which subsists among men, who are all of one nature: for they only inform us of the character of such as are accepted by God, and are in the way to heaven. (Notes, xv. 1. xxiv. 3—6. Rom. ii. 7—11.—P. O. Ps. xv.)—The translation in our prayer-book renders this in the past tense; and though the original might very well bear that meaning, yet the context and the whole tenour of Scripture shew, that this cannot be the exclusive sense; for that would imply, that they alone are blessed, who never have walked in the counsel of the ungodly, nor stood in the way of sinners, nor sat in the seat of the scornful: whereas penitent believers, whatever their previous character has been, are partakers of the blessings, which is evidenced by their subsequent conduct; and none but they answer this description. (Notes, xxxii. 1, 2. cvi. 3—6. cxix. 1—5. Matt. v. 1—12. Luke xi. 27, 28. Rom. iv. 6—8.)—“The ungodly” are those, however moral or virtuous, who profanely despise spiritual blessings, and live without any due regard to God and religion, as all unconverted men do.—“The counsel of the ungodly” signifies, the maxims and principles of worldly men, who form their plans and calculate advantages or disadvantages, according to their several pursuits, without bringing eternal things, and the favour or displeasure of God, into the account: and “walking in this counsel,” signifies an habitual conduct formed on such principles, and regulated according to such rules. “Sinners,” in this climax, seems to mean, those who add to their ungodliness gross immoralities, and such crimes as natural conscience and the opinion of the world protest against. (Notes, Luke vii. 37—39. John ix. 24—34. Rom. v. 6—10.) And to “stand in the way of sinners,” implies, the habit of vices gradually overcoming the sense of shame and remorse of conscience; till a quiet, rarely interrupted by convictions, is superinduced. Yet these occasional convictions are the source of uneasiness; and this prepares the sinner for “sitting down in the seat of the scornful.”—“The scornful” no doubt are those, who encourage themselves and each other in ungodliness and wickedness by infidel and atheistical tenets; and who have recourse to corrupt principles, to bear them out in corrupt practices; and so are given up to a blinded and deluded mind, as a punishment of their conduct in following the impulse of a wicked heart. And to “sit in the seat of the scornful,” is to become teachers and apostles of infidelity, and impiously to ridicule, with all the genius, wit, and sense, which they possess, the doctrines, precepts, and worshippers of God. (Notes, Prov. i. 21—23. iii. 34. xiv. 6. Is. xxviii. 14, 15. 2 Pet. iii. 1—4.)—Thus “the simple ones love simplicity, and fools hate knowledge, and scorers delight in their scorning.”—But the happy persons here described, have been preserved, or recovered, from these dreadful evils. They have, by divine grace, separated from all ungodly companions, and lost their relish for the vain pleasures of the world; they have learned to delight in the word of God, and to meditate continually upon it. This engages their affections, and occupies that time, and those thoughts, which others waste in vanity or sloth: thus they become like a tree planted in a well watered soil, which seasonably brings forth fruit, and abides verdant and flourishing; and whilst they are rendered steadfast and joyful in hope, and fruitful in holiness, they are made useful to others, and eventually prosper in the best desires and purposes of their heart. (Notes, Josh. i. 8. Jer. xvii. 5—8.)—The seat of the scornful. (1) ‘The seat of pestilences.’ Sept. See Acts xxiv. 5. Gr.

V. 4—6. The Psalmist, having briefly stated the character and felicity of the righteous, contrasts with these the worthlessness and misery of the ungodly, however distinguished; comprising all, who are not accepted worshippers of God. These are not only like unfruitful or withered trees, but despicable and useless as the chaff; they are readily driven from one delusion to another; and shall soon be torn away from all their worldly prosperity, and cast into hopeless misery. However their success may now be envied, or their character mistaken, the judgment of God will infallibly separate them from the congregation of the righteous. (Notes, Job xx. 4—29. xxvii. 7—23. Is. xxix. 5, 6. Hos. xiii. 3, 4. Mal. iii. 13—18. Matt. iii. 11, 12.) For the Lord hath appointed, and he approves, the way in which the righteous walk; he knows all its snares, dangers, and difficulties, and will watch over all who walk in it: but he leaves the wicked to the consequences of that way which they choose; and it leads directly to the pit of destruction. (Notes, xxxvii. 18, 19. Prov. iv. 18, 19. Nah. i. 7, 8. 2 Tim. ii. 19.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The tendency of corrupt nature is from bad to worse. Men first forget and neglect God and his worship, and act from worldly maxims and principles; then they often venture on gross and scandalous crimes; and at length they frequently settle in infidelity, or an impious contempt of religion, and become the avowed and determined enemies of its doctrines and precepts. None know, when they first shake off the impressions of a religious education, or venture to neglect known duty, how far they may be left to proceed: when inward and outward restraints are surmounted, they may rush downward into impiety and iniquity, with accelerated velocity, as the stone falls to the earth. We ought to be thankful, if we have been preserved from these dreadful enormities, and have not been left to “sit down” finally “in the seat of the scornful.” And young persons should be warned not to venture aside into a path which leads to consequences so fatal: for numbers are left to wander from God, to be hardened in sin, and finally to perish. But blessed be God for the covenant of grace, and Jesus the Mediator of it: by his perfect obedience even unto death, he is become “the end of the law” “for righteousness to every one that believeth.” Whenever the sinner becomes sensible of his guilt and misery, he may return by Christ, the living Way, and join the company of the righteous. In the exercise of repentance and faith, he separates from the society of the ungodly, in which he can no longer delight. He cannot now act according to their maxims, or conform to their fashions, join in their pleasures, or relish their profane scoffs and jests. Perceiving the vanity of the world and the odiousness of sin, he begins to delight in the word of God, which shews him the preciousness of Christ, and the beauty of holiness. Reading and meditating daily on the sacred Scriptures with faith and prayer, he becomes “in Christ a new creature;” he has now new desires, pleasures, hopes, fears, sorrows, companions, and employments; his thoughts, words, and actions are changed; he enters upon a new state and bears a new character. (Notes, Deut. vi. 6—9.

cxix. 97—100. 2 Tim. iii. 14—17.) “Behold all things “are become new!” and the word of God is the support, comfort, and rule of his new and heavenly life. This man’s religion does not consist in notions or forms; in due season he will bring forth the substantial fruits of righteousness: for he is planted and takes root in a good soil; and, through the word, derives from Christ those communications of divine grace, which gradually transform his soul into the Redeemer’s image. Nor will his profession end in apostasy: for his Saviour lives, and he shall live also; and though he may be tried and often disappointed, yet he shall find at last, that he had all profitable success in each of his undertakings.—How different the character, prospect, and end of the ungodly! Their doom will be as dreadful, as their characters are worthless; for, being “vessels of wrath fitted for destruction,” they will be driven from the presence of the Lord into unquenchable fire. They may indeed here impose upon their fellow-creatures, as well as deceive themselves; but the Judge will perfectly and finally separate them from the righteous, and will send them away into everlasting punishment, while he receives his people into life eternal. (Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—46.) If then we would be happy, we must choose the way which the Lord knows and approves, though it be unfashionable and despised; we must come out and be separate from the wicked; we must learn to redeem our time for the study of the scriptures and attendance on the ordinances of God; we must examine whether we can and do delight in these sacred exercises, and in any measure become fruitful in holiness. And if we meet with troubles by the way, we should keep the end in view: for surely we can never envy those, however prosperous or admired, who throng that broad road which leads to destruction. (Note, Matt. vii. 13, 14.)

NOTES.

PSALM II. V. 1—3. The occasion of this psalm might be taken from David’s advancement to the throne, and his expectation of triumphing over the opposition made to his authority, both by disaffected Israelites and the surrounding nations: (Notes, 2 Sam. ii. 4. 9. v.) but it is throughout an evident prophecy of Christ, and repeatedly quoted as such in the New Testament; where it is ascribed to David, though his name is not prefixed to it. (Acts iv. 25—28. xiii. 33.) The Jews and Gentiles, the rulers, and the people, set themselves to oppose Christ, when he was condemned by the Jewish council, and crucified by the Roman authority, amidst the insults of surrounding multitudes. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 1, 2. 11—18. 27—44.) After his resurrection the same opposition was made to the establishment of his religion; and in every age in one form or another, his kingdom has generally been opposed by the rulers of this world. But the event has uniformly proved, that this attempt, however sagaciously planned, or vigorously conducted, was "a vain thing," an ineffectual and ruinous contest against omnipotence; which originated from a rooted enmity to the authority and commandments of God, and the restraints which they impose on the self-will and corrupt passions of mankind.

V. 4—6. The almighty Sovereign, being fully aware of the intentions of his combined enemies, and able to disconcert them in a moment, disdained their impotent rage; as men deride and laugh at those, who would but cannot hurt them: yet at the same time their enmity excited his indignant wrath; and by his powerful word he determined to confound and destroy them. He would also establish (or anoint, marg.) his King upon his throne and in his authority over his holy church; of which the temple and its worship, and the kingdom of the house of David, upon mount Zion, were types.—Accordingly, when the priests and rulers prevailed on Pilate to crucify their anointed King, they eventually forwarded his exaltation; and their persecution of his disciples drove numbers into remote regions, and thus greatly promoted the promulgation of the gospel. (Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. John xi. 47—53. Acts viii. 4.)—After a time, the Roman legions, the executioners of divine vengeance, surrounded Jerusalem; and at length destroyed the city and temple, and subverted both their civil and ecclesiastical state, with the most dreadful miseries and destruction of the devoted Jews; the wretched remains of whom to this day, scattered throughout the nations, unwillingly attest the fulfilment of this ancient prophecy. The Roman empire too, having set itself against the cause of Christ, began directly to decline, and at length sunk in the unequal contest. (Note, Zech. xiv. 1—3.) The emperor Julian also, an apostate from Christianity, having undertaken to rebuild the temple and restore the Jews, was strangely baffled, and soon came to an untimely end; while the kingdom of Christ continues to this present time, in contempt and defiance of all the machinations of earth and hell.—The Septuagint render the sixth verse, as the words of David or of Christ: ‘But I have been constituted King by him,’ &c.

V. 7—9. The King himself is here introduced, proclaiming the eternal purpose of the Father respecting his mediatorial authority, which was to be the recompence of his propitiatory sufferings. At his resurrection from the dead, he was declared to be the Son of God. (Rom. i. 4.) His Sonship in this place seems mentioned as coeval with the decree, which is grounded upon it:—"Thou art my 'Son,' 'and therefore I make the decree of which, in 'due time, this declaration shall be published.' Christ is here recognized as the begotten of the Father, and as partaker of the divine nature and perfections as really, as any son is of the nature of him who begat him. (Note, John i. 18.) When he had accomplished his work on earth, he was authorized to ask and receive the heathen for his inheritance. For his mediatorial authority extends throughout the earth, for the benefit of his church; and all who are not made his willing subjects, will be as easily and entirely destroyed by his power, as a potter's vessel is broken by the stroke of an iron rod. (Marg. Ref. r.)—The divine appointment of David to be king of Israel, the special favour shewn him, the victories that he obtained, and the dominion which he exercised over the surrounding nations, were very faint shadows of the intended events.

V. 10—12. It would be vain to oppose the unalterable decree of God, that his Son should reign over the whole earth. It was therefore the wisdom of kings and rulers to submit; to fear the wrath, and reverence the majesty of JEHOVAH, and become his servants; to rejoice in their superior rank and prosperity with trembling, lest these should subject them to more aggravated vengeance; to do homage to Christ as their superior Lord, from whom they have their authority; to adore him as their God; and to welcome him as their Saviour, by the kiss of reverence, submission, love, and adoration. (Notes, 1 Sam. x. 1. 1 Kings xix. 18. Hos. xiii. 1, 2.) Otherwise they must perish in their rebellion, far from the way of life: for even those, who provoked this almighty King, by rejecting his authority, though without any circumstances of peculiar aggravation, would experience the terrible effects of his wrath: but all who put their trust in him, as their Saviour, would share the blessings of his righteous and merciful government. (Marg. Ref. d. Note, cxlvi. 3, 4.)—The evident fulfilment of the unequivocal predictions in this psalm, by a series of events exactly answerable to them, during the lapse of many ages, is in reality a full demonstration, that both the prophecy and the accomplishment were from God, and that our holy religion is of divine original and authority. The Jews themselves attest, that this psalm was extant many ages before the birth of Jesus; and many of them allow, that it principally relates to the promised Messiah, whom they are yet vainly expecting! How can any one then be so absurdly sceptical, as to imagine that human sagacity, or mere conjecture, could have suggested explicit predictions, which should at length be verified in the most exact and circumstantial manner, by events no otherwise to be accounted for, than on scriptural principles, and by allowing them to have been effected by the power of God himself!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As this apostate world is in fact the kingdom of Satan, unconverted men of every rank, party, or character, may be excited by him, to concur in opposing the cause of God, and the kingdom of Christ. But the kings and the rulers of the earth have generally been especially instigated, by the slanders and misrepresentations of false teachers, and other interested persons, as well as by their own prejudices and passions, to combine in this opposition. They do not brook submission to a superior; the humbling truths and spiritual precepts of Christ run counter to their ambitious projects and worldly lusts; and they are apt to suppose that his authority is inconsistent with their dignity, or their felicity. Thus they are often excited to employ all their power and policy “against the LORD and against his Anointed;” whilst they deceive themselves with the idea, that they are only opposing some obstinate sectaries, who refuse submission to their edicts. (Notes, John xvi. 1—3. Acts ix. 3—6. xxvi. 9—11.) But these are vain imaginations, which the Lord disdains and abhors; and can effect nothing but the confusion and ruin of those who indulge them. For Jesus, the eternal Son of God, is established, and shall reign upon his holy throne, as the Saviour of his people, and the Avenger of his enemies. The decree of the Father has in part taken effect: the kingdom of the Mediator is fixed on the ruins of Jewish and heathen opposers; and it shall at length universally prevail, whilst every enemy shall be dashed in pieces by his iron rod. (Note, Rev. ii. 24—28.) He was indeed crucified in apparent weakness; but he arose in power, and has asked and received his kingdom over all things, for the benefit of his church. Let then kings and rulers, as well as their subjects, lay down their arms, submit to his authority, trust in him as their Saviour, and worship him as their Lord and God; and let them use all their influence, as his servants, to promote his cause, and advance his kingdom. Indeed we should “rejoice with trembling” in all outward distinctions and possessions, lest the abuse of them should enhance our condemnation; and even in our attempts to serve the Lord, we sinners have need to fear and tremble, lest we come short of his acceptance: but if we have submitted to the Saviour, and come to the Father in his name and merits, we may rejoice in him with reverence, but without consternation. For “he casteth out none who come to him,” however sinful they may have been; but they shall all be blessed for ever: whilst all who oppose, despise, neglect, or abuse his gospel, and will not have him for their Saviour and their King, will incur his indignation; the effects of which, even when “kindled but a little,” will be too dreadful for words to express, or imagination to conceive.

NOTES

PSALM III. Title. These titles are found in the Hebrew, though it is said, that several of them are wanting in some manuscripts. They seem however, in general, to belong to the Psalms to which they are prefixed, and to be of the same authority with them. In this and other instances, they are useful in fixing the interpretation: but often their meaning is to us doubtful or difficult.

V. 1, 2. David abruptly, but in lively faith, addresses himself to the Lord, as amazed to hear of the numbers who followed the unnatural rebellion of Absalom; and especially that many whom he had favoured and trusted, had joined that party. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 12—15. 30.) He also was astonished at the insolence and impiety of his enemies, and that they should interpret his troubles as evidences that God had rejected him, and either could not or would not help him. (Notes, xlii. 1—3. 9, 10. lxxi. 10, 11. 2 Sam. xvi. 5—14.)—The meaning of the word “Selah,” which occurs three times in this psalm, and frequently in others, and also in the prophecy of Habakkuk, is not fully ascertained by expositors. Some entirely omit it: but this may be thought taking an unwarrantable liberty with Scripture. Others suppose it to be merely a musical term, and the Septuagint seem to have thus understood it. (Διαψαλμα, a change of song, or melody.) In general, however, it appears to have been used, as a call on him who read or sang, to pause and reflect; as something peculiarly important or surprising had been mentioned. ‘Selah here signifies a lifting up of the voice, to cause us to consider the sentence, as a thing of great importance.’ Marginal Notes to Barker’s Bible.

from God, the afflicted Psalmist considered him as “a “Shield” around him, yea, as his Glory. (Notes, iv. 2. lxxxiv. 11, 12. 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3.) He had often called on God in trouble and danger, and had been heard: and having now, as in many former instances, committed himself to the divine protection by faith and prayer, he was enabled to sleep with as much composure, as if he had been in perfect peace; and accordingly he was supported, and protected from all injury. (Note, iv. 6—8.)

V. 6—8. (Notes, xxvii. 1—3. 2 Sam. xviii. 5.) The Lord had helped David, and disabled his enemies, when persecuted by Saul and his ungodly adherents; and he was confident, that he would thus appear for him in his present distress: for salvation, temporal and spiritual, came from God alone; and he never failed to bless his faithful people.
(Notes, lxxi. 16—18. cxv. 9—13. cxviii. 1—12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most excellent and eminent persons must expect opposition and ill usage; and they should prepare for ingratitude and contempt, as the recompence of their labours for the good of others. The number and power of their adversaries may become very formidable; and they may be astonished to find among them, such as they have most depended on; nay, their very confidence in God will often be derided, as delusion or presumption. Yet he is a “Shield” to all those that trust in him: they count their relation to him their “glory,” in preference to all dignities or achievements; and in all dangers they continue to hope that he will yet lift up their head above all their enemies.
Indeed, all true Christians should avow their confidence in God, and their expectation from him, in seasons of deep distress; and be open and avowed, as well as fervent, in their prayers unto him, upon his mercy-seat in his holy temple. Thus they will enjoy safety and inward peace, in the midst of enemies and the alarms of war: for the Lord will hear and sustain them; and what are ten thousands of armed foes encamped against those whom the Omnipotent protecteth? (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxii. 8. Rom. viii. 28—31.)— Past experience should encourage the hope of future answers to our prayers; we may even rejoice in being the objects of the enmity of ungodly men; and should desire that they may be deprived of their power to do mischief, but not that any further harm may befall them. Every temporal deliverance should be received as an earnest of eternal salvation; the honour of which must be ascribed to the Lord, who confers that blessing on his people.—

But we shall cease to wonder at the troubles of the king of Israel, and almost to think of our own light afflictions, if we duly look unto Jesus, and contrast his glory and his grace, with the contempt and cruelty with which he was treated. Having yielded himself to death, he sanctified the grave, and became the first-fruits of the resurrection;
his head was then lifted up above his enemies; and thus he has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. His enemies therefore will surely be disappointed and perish;
but his people may go down to the grave, as to their beds, in hope and comfort: for the same God watches over them in both, and they will at length awake to everlasting happiness.

NOTES.

PSALM IV. Title. The “chief musician,” or overseer, or president, seems to have been the person appointed in the Psalmody of the sanctuary, to set the tune and lead the singers and musicians. (Notes, 1 Chr. vi. 33—38. xv. 22.
xxv. 1—8.) “Neginoth” may either mean the instruments with which the psalm was to be sung; or the tune to which it was set. Perhaps this psalm was composed on the same occasion as the foregoing. (iii. title.)

V. 1. Of my righteousness.] By this expression, the Psalmist acknowledged God to be in all respects the Author and Source of his righteousness, as accepted and sanctified; and he appealed to him to do justice between him and his unrighteous adversaries. (Marg. Ref. h.)

V. 2. My glory.] David might have considered his throne as a special honour to him, seeing he was called to it by the immediate choice of God, and as a type of the Messiah: but the Lord himself, and his relation to him, were indeed “his Glory.” (Note, iii. 3—5.) His enemies derided him for this, and wanted to make him ashamed of it, or turned it into a reproach to him: while the vain grounds of confidence, in which they delighted, were de- ceiving them; and while they invented lies to make him odious.—“Ye love vanity: ye seek a lie.”

secuted by Saul: but the latter seems most probable.—The word rendered “meditation,” appears to denote those inward thoughts, desires, fears, or sorrows, which break forth in earnest prayers, or are relieved by complaining unto God, and by pouring out the heart before him.

V. 2—6. (Notes, x. 16. xlv. 4. Hab. i. 12—17. Heb. xii. 14. Rev. xxi. 22—27.)—The word (הוֹלָלִים) rendered “foolish,” signifies insane, or mad; denoting the infatuation of sinners, when urged on by their unbridled passions, to venture all consequences for the sake of present gratification. (Note, Ec. ix. 1—3.)—While men continue impenitent, their characters are abominable in the sight of God, they abide under his wrath, and if they die in that state they must be eternally the objects of his abhorrence. The penitent sinner’s character and state are changed, and he is reconciled to God: but sin is irreconcilably the object of divine hatred. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Rev. xxi. 5—8. xxii. 14, 15.)

V. 7, 8. (Marg. Ref.)—Mine enemies. (8) “Those who ‘observe me.’ Marg. My enemies ‘would gladly see me trip, and they watch for my halting; therefore ... order my goings, ... that I may never ... fall, and give them any advantage over me. ... For with what triumph would they blaze abroad my real faults, who now stick not to tell all manner of lies of me?’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 9. St. Paul quotes this, among other scriptures, to prove the depravity of both Jews and Gentiles in an unconverted state. (Notes, Rom. iii. 9—20.)—If the Israelites, with all their advantages, manifested such hateful dispositions, in opposing “the man after God’s own heart,” and afterwards in their conduct towards their promised Messiah; it is plain that the whole race must be corrupt and alienated from God; that nothing, except an internal renovation by the Spirit of God can make them holy; and that they can never find acceptance with God, upon the ground of their own obedience to his righteous laws; but must be saved mercifully, if at all. The flattery, treachery, and calumny, with which the Israelites behaved towards their anointed king, originated from their hatred to God and holiness; and the profane and polluting discourse, springing from the loathsome filthiness of their hearts, resembled the opening of a sepulchre, which would both be very noisome and unwholesome.—Some, however, consider the open sepulchre as an emblem of rapacity and sensuality. (Note, Prov. xxx. 15, 16.)

V. 10, 11. These verses might be rendered as follows: “Deal with them as guilty, O God! Let them fall by their own counsels. Cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions; for they have rebelled against thee. But all those who put their trust in thee shall rejoice, they shall shout for joy for ever, because thou defendest them. They that love thy name shall be joyful in thee.”—The future tense is indeed often used, for the imperative, or the optative mood, in the Hebrew, which has not that precision, as to tenses and moods, which prevails in many other languages. But where the literal rendering contains simply a prediction, and changing the future for the imperative, or optative, implies an imprecation, or a wish; the literal version is frequently preferable. Yet it cannot be denied, that the form of imprecation is often used; implying that the impenitent enemies of God and Christ will perish, with the approbation of all holy creatures; and that the very prayers of believers for themselves and the church, will be answered in the destruction of their enemies. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxv. 25—28. lviii. 1—3. lxix. 22—28. cix. 6—20.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Before we offer our prayers unto the Lord, we should seriously meditate on his perfections and promises, and on our own character and wants; that our words may be spoken with recollection, from a full heart, in a due sense of our indigence, dependence, and unworthiness, and with fervency and expectation.—If we willingly submit to him as our King, and worship him as our God, we may expect every thing from his almighty favour.—While many are eagerly presenting their petitions to earthly princes, let us make our requests known to our God and King. It is our privilege that we may come before him as often, and ask as much, as we will: and it must be our sin and folly, if we do not avail ourselves of his condescension and bounty. We should take care, that he may hear our voice every morning, as the first and best employment of the day, in order that we may find help and comfort from him, in the various events of it: and let us not forget Him, “who arose a great while before day, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed;” lest we should yield to sloth, or admit carnal excuses for our negligence. (Note, Luke vi. 12. P. O. 1—19.) In this sacred exercise, our affections should be directed to the Lord, and we should look up to him for help; expecting an answer from him, as we do to a letter which we have directed to a kind friend.—Such prayer will determine the heart against every sin: for though the Lord pities sinners, yet he “has no pleasure in iniquity;” nor can we walk or dwell with him, while any sin reigns in our hearts. How great then is the folly and madness of the wicked! and how will they endure to be driven from his presence, as the objects of his unchangeable and eternal detestation! Indeed we none of us could come before God, if it were not for his abounding mercy: humility and reverence then become us in all our worship; and we must always look unto Jesus Christ, the true Temple, in whom God dwells, as reconciled to the believing sinner. (Note, 1 Kings viii. 28—30.) His true worshippers will have many enemies and observers, which will increase their temptations, and render their path more perplexed: but if this excite them to greater watchfulness, and render them more fervent in prayer to be led in the straight way of righteousness, it will be of great service to them.—We need not wonder at the cruelty, treachery, hypocrisy, or flattery of our enemies, when we consider how David and how Christ was treated: but we should remember that we are by nature as depraved as our opposers; that we may renewedly repent of the sinful thoughts, words, and actions of our past lives; that we may still watch over our own hearts, and against all polluting or dissembling conversation; and that we may bless God for restraining or converting grace, and for Jesus Christ and his salvation. We must by no means desire and pray for the destruction of our enemies; but we may predict the ruin of God's enemies, who will “fall by their own counsels, and in the multitude of their iniquities;” and their enmity to his people will be proved to have sprung from their rebellion against him. But we should earnestly pray for, and help, the joy of the righteous: they trust in the Lord's mercy, grace, and providence, and desire to love his name and walk in his ways: he is their Shield and Salvation, and his favour shall protect and bless them for ever.—Neither their former sins, nor their present defects, temptations, conflicts, or troubles, should be allowed to silence their praises, or prevent their rejoicing. Joy is their privilege, their duty, and their strength; and they should be exhorted to “rejoice in the Lord always.”

NOTES.

PSALM VI. (Note, v. title.) Sheminith.] This word signifies the eighth: and some suppose that the Psalm, or tune, was adapted to a harp with eight strings.—This is the first of the penitential psalms; but it is not known on what occasion it was written.

V. 1, 2. ‘Though I deserve destruction, yet let thy mercy pity my frailty.’ (Notes, Is. lvii. 15, 16. Jer. x. 23—25.)—Are vexed. (2) Or, are shaken, or disturbed.

V. 3, 4. (Notes, xiii. 1—4. xciv. 1—7.)—‘Return, O Lord, in mercy to my soul, and relieve and comfort me.’ (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. The Psalmist pleaded, that if God cut him off in his wrath, it would terminate all his opportunities of serving and glorifying him on earth; and if left finally to perish, he should never remember God with gratitude and praise any more to eternity. (Notes, xxx. 9, 10. lxxxviii. 10—12. Is. xxxix. 17—22.)

In the grave.] הַשְׁמָד: εν τω αδη. Sept. The word is often translated hell, and it frequently denotes the place of separate spirits, happy or unhappy, according to the context; yet it sometimes must be understood of the grave, and that appears to be the sense in this place. V. 6, 7. David, as visited and chastised by distressing sickness, and a variety of sufferings; and at the same time, mourning for his sins in deep repentance, complained, that his complicated sorrows caused him every night to water his couch with copious tears, and made him waste, become dull-sighted, and as it were grow old prematurely. In this distress, he earnestly pleaded with God to visit him in mercy, without further delay. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8—10. The Psalmist, having deeply humbled himself before God, at length found his peace and hope revive. As he trusted that the Lord would not leave him to perish in another world, with the workers of iniquity, he resolved not to associate with them in this: and he warned them to repent and cease from their enmity to him; otherwise he was assured, that shame and vexation would suddenly and irrevocably seize upon them. Many mournful psalms end thus triumphantly, for the encouragement of other mourners to hope and pray. (Notes, xiii. 5, 6. xxx. 9—12.)—The old version thus renders the last verse: ‘All my enemies shall be confounded and sore vexed; they shall be turned back, and put to shame suddenly.’ (Note, v. 10, 11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Infidels, profligates, and hypocrites, and ungodly men of every description, have always more noticed David's sins, than his mourning for them: for the former serve for an objection to the truths which they hate, and an excuse for the sins they love; but they are not disposed to imitate him in the latter.—Great tenderness of conscience, and a disposition to mourn for sin with brokenness of heart, distinguish the believer from all other men. He may be overtaken in a fault, nay he may fall into grievous transgression; but recollection fills him with anguish: or if for a space he be, as it were, stupified, rebukes and corrections bring him to himself: and, while conscience performs its salutary but painful office, and he is suffering under the rod of his offended Father, he not unfrequently becomes afraid of his “hot displeasure.” Ashamed and trembling, he then deprecates eternal misery. Pains and enfeebling diseases, which vex his bones, may excite his prayers for deliverance; but the sense of divine wrath, which vexes his soul, renders him most earnest in crying

PSALM VII.

David, protesting his innocence of the crimes charged on him, intreats God to protect him from his enemies, and to plead his cause for the sake of the people, 1—9. He expresses his confidence in God, predicts the destruction of persecutors, and determines to praise the Lord, 10—17.

out, “O LORD, how long?” how long will it be ere thou give me some token of thy pardoning love? ere thou return to glorify thy mercy in saving my soul? The true penitent desires to live on earth to remember and give thanks to his God; and he seeks the deliverance of his soul from hell, and the resurrection of the body from the grave, for the same purpose. To enjoy the favour, and celebrate the praises, of his God and Saviour, form that happiness on earth and in heaven, which he desires; but he cannot endure the thought of ceasing for ever to love and praise him. His sorrow for sin is inward, and flows most in retirement: groans and tears express the compunction of his heart: and when his crimes have dishonoured God, and caused his enemies to exult and triumph, and returning comforts are withheld; his spirits are exhausted, his eye is dimmed, and he seems to wax old before his time. But such mourning will terminate in rejoicing: the Lord will not number the weeping penitent with “the workers of iniquity;” for he will separate from them, and rebuke and warn them. His very tears have a prevailing voice with God, who has heard and will hear his prayers: and all they, who rejoice in the falls and sorrows of the Lord's devoted servants, will be “put to shame, vexed, and perish suddenly,” unless they repent.—Sinners of every rank have sorrowed and wept for their transgressions; but Jesus alone was a sinless sufferer, and through his sufferings, and in no other way, can the penitent find mercy. At length HE will bid the impenitent workers of iniquity to depart from him; and then will all his enemies be confounded, vexed, and perish with an everlasting destruction.

NOTES.

PSALM VII. Title. “Shiggaion” signifies wandering, or variable; and, it is probable, denotes the musick to which the psalm was set.—Many conjectures have been formed concerning Cush; but at last we only know, that he was of the same tribe as Saul, and most likely one of his relations and courtiers, who brought some false accusation against David. V. 8—11. The heart-searching Judge of the world decides not only on men's conduct towards him, but in all the causes between one and another. (Note, xvii. 1—3.) To him therefore David referred the cause between him and his persecutors, desiring to be judged, in this respect, according to his righteousness and integrity, which were known to God. (Notes, xxvi. 1. 2 Sam. xxii. 21—28.)—He also earnestly prayed that the wickedness of the wicked might cease; and that God would establish the righteous.—He was assured, that the righteous Judge and Preserver of the upright, would defend him as a Buckler, (marg.) and would at length manifest that anger, which was every day excited by the crimes of his enemies.—‘How few among Christians seriously and deliberately consider, ‘whether the sentence of that day’ (the day of judgment) ‘is likely to be in their favour!’ yet how many, with the ‘utmost composure and self-complacency, repeat continually the words of this psalm, as well as those in the ‘Te Deum, ‘We believe that thou shalt come to be our ‘Judge!’’ Bp. Horne.

V. 12, 13. ‘Vengeance... will certainly come, though ‘it stay long, and not fail to do execution: for it is decreed in heaven, (if they do not repent,) and will pierce ‘through the heart of Saul, and all the rest of my fierce ‘and outrageous persecutors.’ Bp. Patrick. (Note, 6, 7.)

V. 14—16. ‘When an evil thought is instilled into the ‘heart of a man, the seed of the wicked one is sown; by ‘... cherishing the diabolical suggestion “he conceiveth” ‘a purpose of “mischief;” when that purpose is gradually ‘formed and matured for the birth, he “travaileth with ‘“iniquity;” at length, by carrying it into action, he ‘“bringeth forth falsehood.”’ Bp. Horne. (Note, Jam. i. 13—15.) The persecutor especially, being determined upon iniquity, is restless and in torment, till he can effect his custom, resorted to God by faith and prayer. He had many persecutors: but it is probable that the one, whom he distinguishes from the rest, was Saul; who was so enraged against him, and had so much power in his hands, that he both could, and would, have torn him in pieces, as a lion does his prey; nor would any have attempted to deliver him, had not God been his Protector. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxii. 9—19. xxiii. 26—28.)

V. 3—5. David here appealed to God for his innocence, as to the charges brought against him. So far from having risen up, as an enemy or traitor, against his prince, when at peace with him; or even returned evil for the evil requital which his eminent services had received; (as some explain the clause;) he had twice preserved the life of his treacherous and implacable persecutor, who had not the smallest cause for his cruel enmity. (Notes, 1 Sam. xx. 1—6. xxiv. xxvi. 8—25.) If this were not the case, and if the accusations of his enemies were true; he was willing to lose his life and reputation, and to be exposed to the deepest ignominy. (Notes, Job xxxi. 5—12. 16—23. 38—40. Jer. xvii. 14—18. xviii. 19, 20. 2 Cor. xi. 7—12.)

V. 6, 7. David was assured that the Lord intended to cut off Saul. (Notes, 1 Sam. xv. 26—29. xxiv. 8—15. xxv. 23—31. xxvi. 8—12.) This was “the judgment” which he had commanded,” and for which David prayed, not only on his own account, but for the sake of the people. Saul's tyranny, and neglect of his duty as king of Israel, had crushed and scattered the Israelites: and his persecution and impiety had driven them from the ordinances and worship of God, and seduced them into many crimes. The Psalmist therefore prayed that the righteous Judge would ascend his exalted tribunal, exert his omnipotent authority, and by some visible interposition check the progress of impiety, and give encouragement to his servants; that they might again be collected in his courts, his purpose by any method of deceit and violence. But, with much expense and trouble, he only digs a pit for himself, and the ruin he aimed at others, falls on the crown of his own head, and gives him a mortal wound. Thus Saul was killed by the Philistines, whom he wanted to employ in cutting off David; (Notes, 1 Sam. xviii. 17—27. xxxi. 2—6:) and the Jews, who excited the Romans to crucify Christ, were awfully destroyed by the Romans, and numbers of them crucified. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 24, 25.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God must expect the persecution of the tongue, as a preparation for further injuries; and to the ingenuous mind it often appears very formidable. But no slanderers or persecuting tyrants can do real harm to those who trust in the Lord their God: when there is none else to deliver, he will take care, both of their persons, and their characters; and will preserve them from Satan, that “accuser of the brethren,” and “devouring lion,” and “from every evil work unto his heavenly kingdom.”—Let us then wage our warfare with the weapons of faith and prayer; and, instead of injuring our peaceful neighbours, let us persevere in endeavouring to overcome evil with good. This will enable us to rejoice in the testimony of our consciences, when loaded with slander and obloquy, and to appeal to God with confidence. But ‘wretched they who persecute their benefactor! Happy he who can reflect that he has been a benefactor to his persecutors!’ Bp. Horne. Indeed the Christian would deem himself worthy of all the injury and ignominy, which his foes desire for him, were he guilty of the crimes of which they accuse him.—But, while we patiently bear the injuries to which we are exposed, we should be much affected and grieved, when we behold “one sinner destroying much good:” and we ought to pray that the Lord would convert or destroy all those, who scatter and oppress his people; and effectually interpose to encourage their faith and obedience, and to stop the growth of impiety and infidelity.—When earthly judges abuse their power, it is a comfort to reflect that the Lord will reverse their decrees, and plead the cause of his people: he is a Judge who “trieth the heart and reins;” nor can we stand before him, even according to his new covenant of mercy, without “simplicity and godly sincerity,” and conscientious integrity in our habitual conduct. The Lord is every day provoked by the wicked; and while he waits to receive

PSALM VIII.

The glory of God is displayed in the works of creation, 1—3; and in his condescending love to man, 4—9 the submissions, and pardon the sins, of those who repent and turn to him, he is preparing to execute judgment on all the impenitent. But persecutors must expect his severest vengeance. Satan suggests the mischievous imagination, and they welcome it; and iniquity and murder are thus conceived, and then effected by lies and treachery. Let them however remember, that they are only plotting their own destruction: for the persecuted servants of the Lord will be celebrating his praises, and rejoicing in his favour, while their persecutors are cast into the pit of destruction, and enduring the wrath of their righteous Judge: and all their subtle projects will concur in bringing about this final event.—Let us then under all our trials look unto the Saviour. He alone was perfect in righteousness; yet none was ever reviled, slandered, and hated as he was. He lived and died, doing good to his enemies, and praying for them: but after his exaltation, the welfare of his church required that judgment should be executed upon such as continued impenitent. The Jews first felt the weight of his indignation, and at the same time great multitudes of Gentile converts compassed him about. Wherever Anti-Christian corrupters or persecutors have been from time to time destroyed, the church has been replenished with numerous real converts to the faith; and when these enemies of the truth shall finally come to an end, the whole earth will be filled with truth and righteousness. Shortly will arrive that final judgment which God has decreed, when all unbelievers will finally perish: may we, at that solemn season, ‘be numbered with his saints in glory everlasting!’

NOTES.

PSALM VIII. Title. “Gittith” perhaps is the name of some tune, which David had learned when in Gath, or from the Gittites, and to which this and two other psalms were set. (Marg. Ref.)—Various other conjectures have been formed; and the following may be considered as the most probable. ‘I take it to have been composed by David, after he had overthrown... Goliath of Gath; which is... a lively emblem of Christ’s conquest over our great enemy the devil.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 2. God has often magnified his own perfections, through the simplicity and weakness of the instruments, by which he accomplishes his grand designs. (Note, Judg. vii. 13—22. P. O. 16—25.)—The new born infant is such a display of his power, skill, and goodness, as unanswerably confutes the cavils of Atheism. Even little children have been taught so to love and serve him, that their praises and confessions have baffled and silenced the rage and malice of persecutors: and thus a victorious strength has been manifested by them; while the wise, learned, and mighty, have either joined the enemy, or timidly and feebly crouched before him.—The meanest and most despised persons have often been made successful in their attempts to promote his cause. Thus David overcame Goliath, though but as a babe in comparison of that insulting champion: and the despised Nazarene, with his obscure and unlettered apostles, prevailed against the combined wisdom, learning, and power of the world, and against the sagacity and influence of Satan, "the god of "this world." And by successive instruments whom man disdains, the same cause shall still more fully prevail, till every avenger and enemy is finally stilled, and all the wicked are silent in darkness. (Notes, Matt. xi. 25, 26. 1 Cor. i. 26—31. 2 Cor. iv. 7.)—The LXX render the clause, here translated, "ordained strength," "perfected 'praise';" and the Evangelist, recording our Lord's words, gives them according to that version. (Note, Matt. xxi. 14—16.)

V. 3. The Psalmist appears to have composed this sacred hymn, while his attention was fixed, during the silence of the evening, on "the moon walking in brightness," and on "the stars of light;" but, instead of being tempted to worship the heavenly host, he contemplated the magnificent scene, and the immensity of the creation, till he was filled with adoring admiration of the Creator's incomprehensible majesty, which naturally suggested the subsequent reflections. (Notes, cxlviii. 3. Deut. iv. 19. Job xxxi. 24—28.)

V. 4—9. Adam, even when created in the image of God, was infinitely beneath his Maker; and it was an unspeakable favour for him to be placed at the head of this lower world, in a state of honour and dominion. (Note, Gen. i. 26, 27.) After the fall, it was still more wonderful that his children should be permitted to retain any authority over, or derive any benefit from, the different orders of creatures. But the apostle teaches us, that the Holy Spirit, who spake by David, also intended Christ, the eternal Son of God, who by his incarnation became "the Son of man." Thus he was "made a little lower "than the angels," by assuming and dwelling in a nature inferior to their's, "for the suffering of death:" which object having been accomplished, he arose from the dead, and was "crowned with glory and honour;" and in human nature exercises universal dominion, even an authority infinitely more extensive and absolute, than ever the first Adam possessed, or could possibly have administered. (Note, Heb. ii. 5—9.)—In so wonderful a manner did the God of glory shew himself mindful of feeble, mortal, sinful man! and thus has he visited and honoured one of our race, for the common benefit of all who believe in him! (Note, Ps. cxliv. 3, 4.)

Than the angels. (5) עֲלֵיָאִים. Elohim is generally translated God, or gods: yet the apostle quotes the LXX, who render it angels; which shews the latitude with which the term is used. (Notes, lxxxii. 6, 7. John x. 32—39.) But when the true God is meant, it is, though plural, always joined with the singular verb; and the name JEHOVAH is never given to any but to the true God: and, when applied to Christ, it shews who he is, even "the true God "and eternal Life."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No words can express the glorious excellency of JEHOVAH, our Ruler and Lord; nor can Cherubim or Seraphim reach his worthiness by their most exalted adorations: yet he graciously accepts the upright though feeble efforts of men on earth, and even counts himself honoured by the praises of babes and sucklings! He works by the weakest instruments for the greater confusion of his enemies and the honour of his name; and all the vengeance and rage of earth and hell shall soon be stilled by the prevalence of his despised gospel.—Every creature speaks the Creator's praise to the mind of the devout believer; whose pious contemplations render his solitary walks unspeakably pleasant and profitable. But each display of the divine glory should lead us to reflect on our own meanness and sinfulness. What indeed is man, that the Lord should still visit him, and be mindful of him? What are we, but mean,

PSALM IX.

David praises God for punishing his enemies, and maintaining his cause, 1—6. He shews that God will preserve his servants, and calls on them to praise his name, 7—12. He prays for deliverance from present trials, that he may still praise the Lord; and predicts the ruin of the wicked, 13—20.

guilty, polluted, ungrateful, rebellious, and apostate creatures? We are unworthy of the least of those manifold advantages, which we derive from the sheep and oxen, the fishes and the fowls, and the other animals, which are still subjected to us, and subservient to our benefit: nor should we ever partake of these common mercies, without admiration joined with gratitude. But in the person of Emmanuel, every other instance of divine condescension is eclipsed, and our most exalted previous conceptions of the divine love are far exceeded, and the powers of our minds are almost overwhelmed. His love, his humiliation in assuming our nature, his atoning sufferings unto death, his subsequent glory, and his dominion over all creatures, which shall endure till all enemies are put under his feet, can never sufficiently be admired and adored.—Thus our nature, in the second Adam, is infinitely more honoured and exalted, than it could have been in the first Adam. Thus also the true dignity of human nature, even the worth of a rational, immortal soul, though ruined by sin, yet capable of recovery and eternal felicity, is clearly shewn. And if we trust and submit to Christ as our Saviour and Lord, he will advance us also to glory, honour, and immortality. We had indeed cause to celebrate the excellencies of the Lord our Governor, as displayed in the works of creation: but what words can reach his praises, who is now become our Salvation, and has laid us under new and still more powerful obligations to obedience, as our Redeemer, and as displaying among us sinners on earth those glories, “which angels desire to look into!”

NOTES.

PSALM IX. Title. Muth-labben.] The import of this title, is very doubtful. “Muth” signifies death: and some imagine that “labben” the son, may denote Goliath, either in respect of his eminence, or his coming forth as the champion between the Philistines and Israel. Goliath is called by a name something like this, and which is rendered “a champion.” (אִישׁ־הַחַיִּים, a man who comes between. 1 Sam. xvii. 4.) If, however, this be the meaning, it is very obscurely expressed: and, as Zion was not the place of Israel’s assembling for publick worship, till David had for some time been king over all Israel, the Psalm must have been composed long after Goliath’s death. (11—14.) Others therefore suppose “Muth-labben” to mean, the death of his son, and refer the occasion of the Psalm to the death of Absalom.—The Psalmist might have some reference to the various deliverances of his past life; but he was also lead, while praising God for them, to speak, as the type of Christ, concerning his conflicts and victories, and those of his church; and to celebrate her triumphs over every heathen and Anti-christian persecutor, while he included also the trials and deliverances of every believer.

V. 1—3. The Psalmist determined, on occasion of some recent deliverance, to “praise JEHOVAH with his whole heart;” not feignedly, not as ascribing any share of the honour to himself, not in a cold and languid manner, but fervently and zealously.—He would make the works, which God had wrought for him, known to all around: and thus rejoice in ascribing glory to his name, and in reflecting what a powerful and faithful Patron and Friend he had, and what an honour and benefit this was to him. His enemies hitherto had been turned back, and had stumbled and perished, not by his valour, but by the presence and power of God; and this made him confident of continued victories and final triumph. (Notes, xxvii. 1—3. 2 Sam. xxii. 37—42.)—This admits of the most obvious application to the works of God for his church, and for every believer; and no doubt was intended by the Holy Spirit, to be thus used in our worship and meditations.—O thou most High. (2) “God is in the loftiest and most exalted pre-eminence, and sovereignty, over the whole creation; and in essence and glory, surpassing all comprehension.” (Marg. Ref. e.)

V. 4—6. God had pleaded David’s righteous cause against the wicked persecution of Saul, and had advanced him to the throne of all Israel, with the destruction of almost the whole family of Saul. He had given his king the victory over the surrounding heathen nations, who perished in great numbers, and had finally lost the reputation of their former successes. So that every enemy which had before destroyed the cities of Israel, was deprived perpetually of power to continue these desolations; and most of them soon became so insignificant, that the memorial of them, and of their former greatness, perished with them.—Thus the sixth verse must be understood, if we adhere to the translation in the text; but the marginal reading here seems to give the proper sense. The destructions caused by the enemy were terminated; God had destroyed their cities; and the remembrance of them had failed from among men.—Thus likewise the renowned monarchies, that successively made havock on earth, and oppressed Israel, are now destroyed and almost forgotten; the first opposers of Christ and Christianity have shared the same fate; and all these divine interpositions are earnest of the final ruin of all the enemies of the cause of Christ. (Notes, Dan. ii. 38—45.)

V. 7—12. The reflection on the transient glory of earthly kingdoms, and illustrious conquerors, led the Psalmist to reflect on the eternity of JEHOVAH, and of his universal kingdom. This eternal Sovereign did not, indeed, immediately inflict vengeance on his enemies; but he was preparing his “throne for judgment.” He would soon judge the whole human race in righteousness; and uprightly, or according to his declarations and promises, decide on the cause of each individual belonging to the people of Israel, and all other nations (עַמִּים). In the mean while, he would prove a Refuge for the protection and comfort of such, as were oppressed or persecuted for his sake, to which they should resort in times of trouble or danger. (Notes, lxii. 8—10. 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3. Prov. xviii. 10, 11. Is. xxxii. 1, 2.)—Indeed all who, by believing his word and experiencing his faithfulness and mercy, had obtained the knowledge of his name, or perfections, would trust in him entirely and exclusively; for it had never been known, that the Lord had forsaken any that sought him, because of their weakness, or the power of their enemies. But it was only as dwelling in Zion, on the mercy-seat, above the ark of the covenant, through the sacrifices and ordinances which typified the promised Saviour, that he could be sought by sinful men with acceptance; and therefore his people should abound in praising him, as the God of salvation; and making known his works, that others might learn to seek and serve him.—He sometimes indeed permitted his servants to be tried by persecution; but there would be a season of inquisition for blood, when the prayers of the humble would be remembered, and completely answered. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Is. xxvi. 20, 21.)

V. 13, 14. David, after all his triumphs, still had enemies, conflicts, and trials: the church, though victorious over all former opposers, is still “militant here on earth:” and the believer, though rescued from “the gates of death” and hell, and enabled to bless God for many deliverances, must still encounter troubles and temptations, and mingle prayers with his thanksgivings.—The expression, “the daughter of Zion,” seems to denote the inhabitants of Zion, with all those who came to worship at the sanctuary, (which was placed there when this Psalm was written,) considered as one collective body, the visible church, the type of the true church, which God our Saviour has espoused to himself, and which, in the true mount Zion, the heavenly Jerusalem, shall shew forth all the praises of him, who has lifted her up from the gates of death, and raised her to that glorious felicity. (Notes, xxii. 22—25. cxviii. 19—24. Is. xii. 4—6. Heb. xii. 22—25. Rev. xiv. 1—5.)—The contrast between “the gates of death,” and “the gates of the daughter of Zion,” is remarkable. (Marg. Ref.)—I will rejoice, &c. (14) Notes, xiii. 5, 6. 1 Sam. ii. 1. Hab. iii. 17—19. Luke i. 46—55.)

V. 15, 16. The several nations, who had engaged in war against David, had only brought destruction on themselves, by all their combinations and stratagems; and given JEHOVAH the occasion of manifesting his power and justice, in the judgments which he executed upon them.—To this reflection the Psalmist adds, “Higgsaion Selah;” a thing to be meditated on with the greatest attention: (‘res meditanda summè,’ Junius;) probably, this is the true meaning of the two words thus connected. (Marg.) The example was very instructive, and ought to be deeply considered by the enemies of God for their warning, and by his servants for their encouragement in seasons of trouble and danger.

V. 17. ‘All wickedness came originally with the wicked one from hell; thither it will be again remitted; and they who hold on its side must accompany it on its return to that place of torment, there to be shut up for ever.’ Bp. Horne. This will be the case even with whole nations who forget God, and their obligation to him, and that worship and obedience which they owe him: for this forgetfulness is the effect of ingratitude, contempt, and aversion, it deserves his wrath, and is the source of all other crimes. (Note, Rom. i. 28—32.)—The future condemnation of the wicked seems to be intended; for as all men go down to the grave, the word, rendered hell, must in this connexion have a more awful meaning. (Notes, xvi. 8—11. Rev. xx. 11—15.)

V. 18—20. Many princes have claimed and received divine honours: the arrogant titles of infallibility and of his holiness, which one chief antichrist has assumed, are well known: and the proud and impious conduct of multitudes too evidently proves, not only that they forget God, but that they forget themselves to be men; sinful, weak, and dying creatures, who will soon be called to give an account of themselves to God.—David therefore prayed that these haughty enemies of the Lord and his people, might be so terrified, as to recollect their own weakness, and submit to omnipotence. The LXX translate the first clause, “Place a lawgiver over them;” and the original word, by varying a vowel point, means a Teacher; and in this sense the prayer is for their instruction and conversion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All our mercies should be acknowledged before God, in fervent praises: the whole glory of every success or deliverance belongs to him; our whole heart should be lifted up in rendering him this tribute; we should delight in shewing forth publicly his marvellous works, to us and to his church; and our joy must not rest in any of the gifts of our God, but ascend to him, and centre in him as our all-sufficient Portion.—The enemies of Christ and of his people for a time may stand their ground, and prevail: but in due season, they will be dismayed, and fall and “perish at his presence.”—He who advanced David, and maintained his righteous cause; who exalted the Saviour “to his own right hand in heavenly places,” in defiance of all his enemies; will shortly bring to an end the wickedness of persecuting tyrants, and cover them with eternal infamy. This almighty Lord will help the Christian also in all his conflicts and temptations, and support and comfort him in all his troubles, till he is finally delivered from the body of sin; and till “Satan is bruised under his feet,” and death itself is “swallowed up in victory.” The eternal God has already prepared his throne for judgment: he will certainly execute judgment in righteousness and in faithfulness; and then every iniquitous sentence will be reversed, and every oppressor punished.—In the mean while, all “who know his name, will trust in him” for temporal protection and eternal salvation; and their experience will daily increase their knowledge and confirm their faith: for the Lord never did, and never will, forsake or reject any, who seek his favour according to his word. He is “in Christ reconciling the world unto himself;” he may be found on a mercy-seat: let saints then sing praises to him, and call upon sinners to come and trust in him. The blood of many martyrs has been shed, and their persecutors have supposed that no inquisition would be made for it: but from time to time the Lord anticipates that day, when “the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain.” He is ever mindful of the cry of the humble. His consolations more than counterbalance outward afflictions, and if any are cut off by martyrdom, their souls are forwarded to heaven. There the church is triumphant; here it must be militant.—Satan, who hates us, will stir up opposition and excite our depravity by his suggestions: but the Lord, who has lifted us up from the gates of death and hell, considers all our conflicts and temptations; he will give us merciful deliverances on earth, that we may praise him with his people; and in a little time will completely rescue our souls; that, in his temple above, we may rejoice in his salvation and triumph in his praise. Then the wicked of every description will sink into the pit of destruction: their own crimes will fall upon them, and they will be caught in their own snare: then especially will the power and justice of God be made known to all the world, by “the judgments that he execute;” and even whole nations of those, who forgot and despised him, shall be turned into hell, and for ever shut up in that region of darkness and despair.—Many of his people are here permitted to be poor and afflicted, and seem to be forgotten; and they are all “poor in spirit,” and have nothing to trust to but his mercy and grace. But they shall not always be forgotten: their expectation of help and salvation from God shall not perish in disappointment for ever.—Often it has seemed, as if man would prevail against the cause of God; but the church has prayed, her Advocate has pleaded, and the arm of the Lord has been extended; some of her enemies have been judged and have perished; many have been intimidated, and others humbled in cordial submission; so that the cause of God yet maintains its ground. Still we have abundant reason to unite in prayer, and to say, ‘Arise, O Lord, let not Satan or man prevail to confine thy church within such narrow limits, to corrupt it by so many heresies and scandals, or to distract it with so many divisions and disputes: put those in fear and to shame, who arrogate more to themselves, than can belong to fallible, sin-

NOTES.

PSALM X. V. 1. David's name is not prefixed to this Psalm; yet it is probable that it was composed by him, with reference to the persecution, which he and the church of God suffered during the reign of Saul: but it is applicable to similar cases in every age. While the trial continues, and comfort and deliverance are withheld, the Lord seems to "hide himself," or to "stand at a distance," as if regardless of the event: (Notes, xiii. 1—4. xxii. 1:) but he only waits to be called upon by importunate prayer to come and deliver his people.

V. 2—11. Several of the psalms seem intentionally to have been written in general terms, that they might serve to direct the devotions of the church in persecution, and those of every believer in his personal troubles and afflictions.—Pride and ambition caused Saul to envy and hate David, as one who had eclipsed his glory, and who was appointed by God to the kingdom, as "the man after his own heart;" and therefore he persecuted him. (Notes, 1 Sam. xviii. 6—11. xx. 31.)—The Jewish priests, scribes, and rulers hated Christ and his apostles, because their ignorance and hypocrisy were exposed, and their authority endangered, by his clear and convincing instructions, his answers to their objections, and his holy example: and the same general principle has made way for the persecution of the humble and zealous servants of God in all ages. But the Psalmist predicted, (for the original is in the future tense, "They shall be taken, &c.;") that his enemies would ruin themselves, instead of him.—Saul at length avowed and boasted of his desire of murdering David, which at first he concealed: and he "blessed the covetous," who courted favour by betraying him. But God abhorred such men; as indeed they resembled Judas who sold his Lord.—Saul, with evident haughtiness, refused to submit to the decree of God made known by Samuel, or to seek his favour; and in his subsequent conduct, he acted as an infidel or an atheist. He became grievously cruel and oppressive in his government, especially when he murdered the priests. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxii. 14—19.) God's judgments were out of his sight: he believed nothing about them; and, growing more presumptuous by impunity, he scorned all those as enemies, who opposed his rage. His conversation became a mixture of profaneness, perjury, violent imprecations, and deceit; and he was continually avowing his base and mischievous purposes. (Notes, 1 Sam. xx. 30—33.) Personally, and by his agents, he watched for David in every place where he was likely to surprise him; being bent on murdering a poor fugitive who had never injured him, as much as a hungry lion is of seizing his prey. Nay, he even seemed to pay court, and humble himself, to David and others, as well as to stoop to the meanest practices, that he might get him within his reach, and murder him by one of his captains. This deliberate plan of virulent opposition to one whom God had

And thus also in the 13th verse.—פָּהֵל, in pihel, generally means, to provoke, or greatly to despise.—The clause may either mean, “the Lord abhorreth, or despiseth, the covetous man;” or, “the covetous man despiseth, or provoketh, the Lord.” (Zech. xi. 8.)

V. 12, 13. The honour of God required, that such impious persons, who despised him and defied his wrath, should be openly rebuked; and his oppressed servants, who entrusted their cause with him, as openly delivered. (Marg. Ref.)—“What is it, but thy long-suffering, ... that makes the wicked thus insolently despise thee? He concludes, ‘thou wilt never punish him, because thou art so patient with him.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 14, 15. Though the Lord did not immediately appear to punish the persecutors, the Psalmist was fully assured, that he observed with strict attention all their mischief and malice; and would by his power openly requite his enemies. In confidence of this, his poor and persecuted servants “left themselves” in his hands, as destitute orphans who had no other helper, but who were assured of his compassionate protection. They also prayed against their oppressor, that God would “break his arm,” (or deprive him of power,) and search out, in order to terminate, his wickedness, that none of it might remain. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lviii. 6—9. Ez. xxx. 20—26. Zech. xi. 15—17.)

V. 16. The Canaanites had been destroyed out of the land by the power of JEHOVAH, the eternal King of Israel; and Saul and his adherents were in reality no less heathens than they: David, therefore, in faith expected their extirpation from among the people of God. (Note, Rev. xi. 1, 2.) The original words, (עוֹלָם וָעֶד) rendered “for ever and ever,” appear always strictly to denote eternity.

V. 17, 18. The encouragement to be derived from the readiness, which God had ever shewn, to answer the prayers of the humble; the reason of this condescension to them in particular, because their prayers sprang from hearts prepared by his special grace; (Notes, Rom. viii. 24—27. Jam. v. 16—18. Jude 20, 21;) the pleasure, so to speak, which he took in listening to them; and the deliverance in consequence granted to his church by crushing worldly oppressors; are circumstances replete with instruction and encouragement.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As every believer, and the whole church, in conformity to Christ, must have seasons of trial and humiliation, the tempter and his party for a time succeed; (Note, Gen. iii. 14, 15;) and the Lord will sometimes seem to stand at a distance when his help is most wanted. But this will lead the believer to humble faith and prayer, and conduce to his good; and he should remember that even the Saviour once exclaimed, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 46. 50.) For it is far better to be a tempted, persecuted, and deserted saint, than a prosperous persecutor.—It is a sad mark of a reprobate mind, when men glory in those desires, principles, and practices, which are really shameful. (Note, Phil. iii. 17—19.)—Nothing is more hateful to God, more contrary to true religion, or more prolific of other crimes, than covetousness. Yet many who are severe against sins of inferior malignity, favour and speak well of the covetous; too often, it is to be feared, from covetousness in themselves. But persecutors are most liable to this; for the tools which they employ, are generally those who sell their souls, and would, if they had the opportunity, sell Christ himself, “for filthy lucre’s sake.” (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 14—16. 57—62. Acts vi. 9—14. 1 Tim. vi. 6—10.)—Pride, however, is especially the image of Satan and the root of apostasy; and where it greatly prevails, it will appear even in a man’s looks. The proud man scorns dependence, or subjection to any Lord; he feels no want of a Teacher, a Priest, or a Saviour; he excuses or vindicates his transgressions of God’s law; he abhors the humbling truths of his gospel; and he is more disposed to rival God, or rob him of his glory, than to render him the worship and obedience which he demands. (Note, 2 Thes. ii. 3, 4.) He therefore banishes from his mind all thoughts of him, as much as he can. From such ungodliness, iniquity and fraud must spring of course; except as restrained by the fear of man or by contrary lusts. And when a person of this character obtains power and authority, he is formed for a tyrant and a persecutor. The judgments of God are not feared or thought of; human opposition is disdained and derided. Grievous oppressions conducted with perjuries, deceit, lies, and all kind of abominable words and actions, may be expected, as circumstances arise and occasion requires. (Notes, 2 Thes. ii. 8—12. 2 Pet. ii. 15—19. Jude 11—13.) From this source, no doubt, originates a great part of that enmity and contempt, which infidels express against the inoffensive disciples of Christ. Full of self-conceit, they affect to be thought wiser, and are ambitious of being greater, than other men. They consider Christianity and its zealous friends as standing in their way; and in opposing them, they bring ruin on themselves.—Alas, how many in all ages have answered this character! and more have shewn the disposition, who could not or dared not indulge it. Indeed, all our deliberate sins spring from unbelief, forgetfulness, or contempt of God; and our hearts are prone to atheism itself. But the Lord beholds, and will requite, the spite and malice of his enemies, and all those crimes, which elude or out-brave human justice: he will judge in behalf of the fatherless and oppressed, against the worldly oppressor. Let then the poor, afflicted, persecuted, or tempted believer recollect, that Satan is, by usurpation and human choice, the prince of this world, and the father of all wicked men: and the children of God cannot reasonably expect much kindness, truth, or justice, from such persons as formerly “crucified the Lord of glory.” But this once-suffering Jesus, now reigns as King over all the earth, for the benefit of his church; and of his dominion there shall be no end. Let us then commit ourselves unto him. Let us humbly trust in his mercy, and beg of him to prepare our hearts for himself; for the desires which he imparts, he will regard and answer. He will rescue the believer from every temptation, and break the arm of every oppressor, and “bruise Satan under our feet shortly.” When that enemy shall be chained, and cast into the bottomless pit, every antichrist shall be destroyed, oppression and persecution shall cease, and the nations shall learn war no more; for they shall become the kingdoms of our Lord Jesus, the Prince of peace. But from heaven alone will all sin and temptation be excluded: no Canaanite shall find entrance there; no lust shall then remain in the heart of any inhabitant; no imperfection will be known; but all shall be complete in love, purity, and joy.

NOTES.

PSALM XI. V. 1—3. It is probable, that this psalm was composed, when David first began to be in danger from the envy and malice of Saul; and that after David came to the throne, it was given to the chief musician for the service of the sanctuary.—Many suppose these verses to be the language of enemies, who wanted to discourage David's hope in God: but, as the unprincipled wickedness of his persecutors is fairly allowed, it is far more likely that they contain the prudent advice of his timid friends; who advised him, and his small party, to flee from court to their mountain, (the pronoun is plural,) to some place of safety pointed out to them, as the bird escapes from the fowler. They represented, that malice and treachery were combined against him; and that he would soon be slain, as by an arrow shot in the dark, from an unknown hand; that all foundations of religion and justice were subverted; that the most upright conduct would rather endanger him, than do him any service; and that there was no good to be done by the most righteous persons in such circumstances: or, “The righteous man, what is he doing,” who expects safety in such a dangerous situation? But David considered the service of Saul and of Israel, as his post of duty; and, trusting in the Lord, he would not at present listen to any exhortations to desert it. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxii. 5. xxvii. 1, 2.)

V. 4, 5. In the subsequent part of the psalm, David shews the reasons of his confidence. JEHOVAH, as dwelling in his sanctuary, and manifesting his glory from the mercy-seat, was the God of Israel, the reconciled Friend of his people: but his throne was fixed in heaven, far above the power and machinations of all earthly potentates. (Notes, cxv. 3—7. 1 Kings viii. 27. Is. lvi. 1, 2.)—His omniscience, perfectly viewing the character of every man, and his impartial justice, concurred in detecting and punishing wicked persecutors and oppressors, who were the objects of his holy and most decided detestation: and though he tried and proved the righteous by sharp afflictions, yet the event would certainly be favourable to them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. The language of this verse is evidently taken from the awful judgment of God on Sodom and Gomorrah, which were destroyed by fire and brimstone from heaven. (Notes, Gen. xix. 24, 25. Deut. xxix. 19—25.) Thus at last the wicked, ensnared in their own counsels, and driven away by the wrath of God as a tremendous tempest, will

V. 7. 'He who is in himself essential righteousness, cannot but love his own resemblance, wrought in the faithful by his good Spirit: with a countenance full of paternal affection, he beholds and speaks peace and comfort to them, in the midst of their sorrows; until admitted, through mercy, to that glory, from which justice excludes the wicked, and beholding that countenance which has always beheld them, they shall enter on a life of boundless and everlasting felicity.' Bp. Horne. (Notes, Rev. xxi. 22—27. xxii. 1—5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servant of God should abide in his place and at his work, though it expose him to many dangers and difficulties : and the honour of God, the interests of his people, and regard to consistency of character, require eminent persons to expose themselves more, in times of persecution, than their inferiors are called to do. (Notes, Neh. vi. 10—14. Dan. vi. 10, 11. Acts viii. 1.) But the believer, though not terrified by the power and rage of his enemies, will frequently be tempted to desert his post, or to neglect his work, by the fears of his friends. They will clearly see his danger ; but, through want or weakness of faith, they will not perceive his security ; and they will often give him counsel, which savours of worldly policy, rather than of heavenly wisdom. But such dangerous temptations must be rejected with firmness and decision. (Note, Matt. xvi. 21—23.) Let it not be thought, that, in times of prevailing iniquity, when all regard to the laws of God and man is discarded, the righteous can do no good. ‘ All is not over, while there is a man left to re‘ prove error, and bear testimony to the truth ; and a man, ‘ who does it with becoming spirit, may stop a prince, or ‘ senate, when in full career, and recover the day.’—‘ No ‘ place on earth is out of the reach of care and trouble.
‘ Temptations are every where ; and so is the grace of God.’
Bp. Horne.—The upright and zealous servants of God are indeed peculiarly exposed to the malice of wicked persecutors, who commonly have power on their side; but let us not forget the almighty God. Upon his mercy-seat he hears the prayers, and defends the cause, of his people; but into that holy temple the daring sinner has no access. On his exalted throne he rules over all the kings of the earth; he notices all the devices of his enemies, and the perils of his friends: he will permit the persecutor to proceed just as far as is requisite, to prove and increase the faith and holiness of his servants. (Notes, lxvi. 8—10. lxxvi. 10. cxxv. 3.) But he abhors those, who delight in cruelty and violence, and will shortly assign them their horrible portion in the pit of destruction. He loves his own image in his people; he beholds them with complacency and paternal care; he protects their lives till their work be done, and then receives them to his heavenly kingdom. And what has he to fear, who has a righteous cause, a rejoicing conscience, an almighty Friend, and a faithful promise on his side? (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 29—33.)

NOTES.

PSALM XII. V. 1—4. This psalm may be supposed to have been written towards the end of Saul's reign; when his impiety and abuse of authority, had given such a sanction to vice and ungodliness, that not only piety, but truth and honesty, seemed about to expire; while every kind of wickedness was practised without fear or shame.—Dissimulation, flattery, profane and arrogant boastings, treachery, and calumny, were the general recommendations of the superior people in Israel, to the favour of their king and his courtiers; and the infection spread rapidly among all orders of men. Forgetful of God, to whom they were indebted for the gift of speech, and for what purpose it was given, and of their accountableness to him, they considered their tongues as their own, to be employed as they pleased; and they thought to carry all before them, by their wit, eloquence, flatteries, or calumnies. But in fact they were only exposing themselves to the judgments of God, against flatterers and proud boasters. (*Marg. V. 5, 6. For the comfort of the remnant of poor and persecuted believers, David addressed them in his prophetic character. The Lord assured them, that he noticed their oppressions, and regarded their sighs and sorrows; and that he was about to arise in order to punish their enemies, and to set them in safety from the power, and the cruel sarcasms and menaces, to which they were exposed. He also reminded them, that they might confidently depend on this assurance; for the words of God formed a perfect contrast to the deceitful and iniquitous speeches of their neighbours. His testimonies and promises had often been tried by his servants, during the sharpest distresses, and had always been found sincere and faithful; and every one of his words was holy, just, good, and inestimably precious: they were like silver, which has been many times refined, in the most perfect manner, from all remaining alloy.—The death of Saul, the ruin of his party, and the advancement of David to the throne, in a short time after this, formed an exact fulfilment of the prediction.

V. 7. The LXX render this verse as follows, ‘Thou, LORD, wilt guard us, and preserve us from this generation, and for ever.’ Not only from this wicked race, but “from every evil work unto thy heavenly kingdom.” (Note, 2 Tim. iv. 16—18.)

V. 8. When such vile men as Doeg and his party, (the dregs of the human race,) were advanced to great authority; the wicked were emboldened to shew themselves, and encouraged openly to avow their corrupt principles, and practise every kind of iniquity. (Notes, lii. 1 Sam. xxii. 6—19.) But when the power should be put into other hands, they would be driven away, and the righteous would be countenanced: and this would soon take place. (Notes, ci.) “The wicked walk on every side: when they are exalted, it is a shame for the sons of men.” Old Translation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

To the carnal mind, increasing taxes, the decay of trade, and such like events, characterize bad times; but the decrease of piety, and the prevalence of iniquity, form the worst times, in the judgment of the spiritually-minded.—When pious men are removed by death, and none are raised up in their places; when the authority, influence, and example of the great, embolden men in impiety, and discourage the profession of godliness, and the labours of faithful ministers; when apostasies, superstitions, and damnable heresies corrupt the church, or when persecutions waste it, and when infidels and profligates triumph; then the believer thinks the times very bad, however otherwise peaceful and prosperous. But by these very things he will be excited to call upon God, who can and will deliver, when human help is vain.—Honesty and sincerity will not long survive piety in any place: they who cast off all regard to God, will dissemble and flatter to serve their own interests with man: and reciprocally, daring iniquity will increase impiety; till men speak and act, as if they had made themselves, could take care of themselves, and need please none but themselves. But he who made man’s mouth, will call him to an account for all his proud, dissembling, profane, and even useless words: (Note, Matt. xii. 33—37 :) and he who made our souls and bodies, is Proprietor of them, and demands the use of them. He will cut off the flatterer as well as the slanderer, and the proud infidel as well as the covetous oppressor. He waits, till his people are sufficiently tried, and till his enemies have filled up their measure: but he hears the sighs and prayers of his afflicted people; and he will defend their cause, and deliver them from the generation of the wicked, and from the wicked one, and that for ever. He will also rise to revive his church from the ruins, with greater glory: he hath promised, and his word is more pure and precious than the finest silver. Let us rest upon it, and comfort our souls with it; though we cannot but grieve to see the degeneracy of the times, and the abounding of iniquity and infidelity. And even should we witness the advancement of the vilest of men to the highest dignities in church and state, and the consequent triumphs of error and wickedness over the cause of truth and holiness; still let us wait and pray: the Lord will yet make his cause triumphant; and the prayers of the remnant of his people are an appointed means of ushering in those better and more glorious days, which cannot now be very far distant.

from the painful conflict; they may then be led to suspect, that their past experience was a delusion, and to fear that the Lord intends to cast them off for ever. At such times their fervent expostulations with God will very frequently be tinged with unbelieving fears. They cannot bear, that their Beloved should seem to forget them; they are tormented at the thought of final separation from him; they are wretched under the suspension of his comforts; and they cannot but anxiously enquire, "how 'long" this painful trial is to last, and whether it must be for ever. They inwardly take counsel about ascertaining the state of their souls, discovering the cause of their troubles, or devising how to obtain deliverance; but all seems in vain: every day appears an age, while continual sorrow oppresses their hearts; and they are ready to trouble themselves with the idea, how Satan and their other enemies are triumphing in their fallen state. All this however is intended for their humiliation; that they may search out and repent of their sins, renounce every false confidence and worldly idol, and be made more fervent in prayer. They will not then say, "There is no hope:" but after his example, who "being in an agony prayed more earnestly," they will call upon God to consider their trouble, and to lighten their eyes; to confirm their hope, direct their path, and renew their comforts; that they may not lie down in darkness and despair. They will plead with him the triumphs of the ungodly and of Satan, if they should be left under the power of sin, in despondency, or to perish; and surely it cannot be for his glory, that his worshippers should be insulted over by his enemies! In this way, they will pour out their prayers, renouncing all confidence, save in the mercy of their God through the Saviour's blood: and at some times suddenly, at others gradually, they will find their burdens removed, and their comforts restored. Believing, they then rejoice in his salvation, and their doleful complaints are changed for songs of praise and thanksgiving. (Notes, Is. xii.)—But, even though long delays take place, they who trust in the Lord's mercy, shall at length rejoice in his salvation; they shall allow that their fears and complaints were unnecessary; and shall joyfully and gratefully acknowledge, that "he hath dealt bountifully with them." (P. O. Job ix.) And it may be of use to the tempted and discouraged believer to recollect, that the Saviour, soon after his doleful complaint, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" subjoined, "It is finished;" and, "Father, into thy hand I commend my spirit:" and that the depth of his humiliation immediately preceded the dawn of his glorious exaltation. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 46, 50. John xix. 28—30.)

'gave him was before his great sin, and so he was full of confidence; but that of Absalom was after it, which 'made him cry out in this doleful manner.' Bp. Patrick.—A concurrence of inward and outward trouble made the Psalmist fear, lest God should have forgotten to be gracious towards him, having cast him out of his presence, to be no more regarded. (Note, lxxvii. 5—12.) But could the Lord really intend thus finally and eternally to reject him, and to hide his face from him? Would he always leave him to perplex himself with vain counsels and contrivances, and to be oppressed with melancholy thoughts, without inward comfort, or outward relief? Would he permit his cruel enemy, who was also an enemy to religion, to insult over him? He could not suppose this would be the case; and he begged that God would think of his heavy sorrows, so as to direct him in his perplexity, by giving him heavenly wisdom; to cheer him with divine consolations; and to relieve his distresses: lest he should die in darkness and despondency, and thus give occasion for exultation to his impious foes.—Whatever enemy the Psalmist especially meant, Satan, our common enemy, was not forgotten.

'How would the powers of darkness boast,
'If but one praying soul were lost!' Watts.

V. 5, 6. David here owns his unworthiness, as well as his misery: but as the salvation of God originated from his rich mercy to sinners; and as he was conscious that his whole dependence was placed on that mercy, and not in any claim he could make on divine justice; he took courage from this consideration, and rising above his distresses, he became confident that he should soon rejoice in God, as delivered and comforted by him; and celebrate, in glad songs of praise, the gracious interposition of the Lord in his behalf.

Hath dealt bountifully. (6) חַנּוּן, 'retribuere, conferre... bonum vel malum.' Robertson.—The LXX render it here by εὐεργετῶ, and also in cxvi. 7: and by ἀνταποδιδῶμι, cxix. 17.—The verb is more frequently rendered reward or recompense, but a gracious recompence is intended, when good received from God is spoken of; and this is "dealing bountifully." (lxii. 12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most eminent believers are sometimes left to great discouragement, either for the chastisement of their sins, or the trial of their faith. When former comforts are suspended, and a sense or fear of divine wrath unites with an accusing conscience; or when temptations stir up the corruptions of the heart, and they can find no deliverance

NOTES.

PSALM XIV. V. 1. This psalm is thought to have been written on occasion of Absalom's rebellion, and the people's defection from their aged and pious king; and the mention of Zion, as the place whence salvation was to come (71), shews that it was composed some time after David came to the kingdom over all Israel. From the degeneracy of Israel shewn in that instance, the Psalmist takes occasion to lament the entire depravity of human nature: and the psalm is almost entirely the same as the fifty-third.—The word fool (חָסִיד) in scripture, denotes one who not only is destitute of true wisdom, but who hates it; the openly ungodly and wicked man. (Marg. Ref. a.) Persons of this description, "like not to retain God in their knowledge," and therefore "say in their hearts, No God." Averse from obedience and submission to the authority of any superior, and even from the thoughts of an omnipotent ever-present, heart-searching, and righteous Governor and Judge; and disliking his spiritual worship and holy law; they secretly wish that there were no God; they try to hope there is none; they seek for arguments and objections against his existence, perfections, or authority; they try to believe what they wish to be true, and by the aid of Satan, through the just judgment of God, they in a measure succeed. In order, however, to exclude troublesome misgivings, and to strengthen their cause, they propagate these absurdities, and endeavour to make proselytes.—This is the real history of the rise and progress of atheism, that deepest stigma of human nature. Man, having done abominable works, being conscious of guilt, and bent on further transgression, expects nothing but wrath from God, and so runs into atheism for a shelter from terror and alarm: unless idolatry, or some species of false religion, can be rendered equally efficacious in quieting the conscience, and giving encouragement in sin. And, as speculative atheism is the offspring of a depraved heart and vicious life, it also tends to the increase of wickedness: thus the fatal infection spreads, and produces general degeneracy and profligacy. (Note, Rom. i. 28—32.)

derstood his obligations, duty, and interest, or that sought the favour and glory of the Lord. All were turned aside from the right way into different ways of disobedience: all were become filthy and corrupt, or putrid, in his sight: not one could be found disposed to do that which is spiritually good.—This must be understood of man left to himself, man as he is by nature, without regeneration: and St. Paul quotes the passage to prove the need which both Jews and Gentiles have of redemption and salvation by grace, and through faith in Christ. (Notes, Rom. iii. 9—20.)—Between this verse and that which follows, three verses are inserted in the version used in the common Prayer Book, which are taken from some copies of the Septuagint: for in other copies they are not found, any more than in the Hebrew and Syriack. The apostle in the third chapter of Romans, has the same verses; and it is evident that he selected them from several parts of the Old Testament, especially from the fifth, thirty-sixth, and one hundred and fortieth Psalms, and the fifty-ninth chapter of Isaiah: it is therefore probable, that some transcriber of the Septuagint inserted those verses from that remarkable passage of the apostle.

V. 4—6. Every kind of wickedness will in the event be found contrary to prudence and wise self-love. But those who persecute the worshippers of God, and take pleasure in this hateful employment, and refuse to ask any mercy or favour from him, do in effect set him at defiance; which is the height of madness and folly. (Notes, John xv. 17—21. Acts viii. 1. xxvi. 9—11.) Yet, when they would cast off the fear of God, they become slaves to various terrors; and often add one crime to another, from fear of offending their fellow-creatures, or to avoid the consequences of their former misconduct. Whereas God dwells among the righteous, to protect them from dangers and alarms.—The Psalmist having stated these general principles, remonstrates with his insulting enemies, for deriding the counsel of the poor believer, who makes the Lord his refuge: when their own inward terrors evince, that they cannot find security and comfort elsewhere.

V. 7. The more fully and deeply David experienced and witnessed the depravity of man, and the disposition of Israel to apostatize; the more fervently he longed and prayed for the salvation of Israel, by the power and favour of JEHOVAH, who was worshipped on mount Zion. By this it is reasonable to suppose, that he did not merely intend Israel's deliverance from bondage, or from subjection to foreign enemies or domestick usurpers: nor did he pray only for his own restoration to the throne, and return to the courts of God; but especially for the promised kingdom and salvation of the Messiah, and for the deliverance of his people from the "captivity" or bondage of Satan, to the liberty of God's service, with all its glorious and joyful effects. Salvation.] שְׁלוּמָה; nearly the same as JESUS. (Note, Matt. i. 20, 21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All the wickedness of men's words and actions springs from the corrupt fountain of their hearts: and if the thoughts of ungodly persons were detected and published, (as they will be at the day of judgment,) how vile would they appear! (Note, 1 Cor. iv. 3—5.)—Infidelity and iniquity have a reciprocal influence on each other; and they are progressive, till men's foolish hearts become darkened, and atheism is conceived and promulgated. Men differ in their peculiar propensities and outward characters: but they are all naturally carnal, alienated from God, destitute of true wisdom, incapable of things spiritually good, gone aside from the right way, and corrupt in their desires and imaginations: and therefore all would have gone further, and sunk deeper in "abominable works," continually and eternally, if it had not been for the inestimable redemption of Jesus Christ. We should be thankful, if we have been restrained from the more destructive excesses, into which so many are hurried; but we ought not to rest in any thing short of union with Christ, and a new creation unto holiness by his Spirit. If we have experienced this blessed change, let us give the Lord all the glory; and let us pity and pray for our fellow-sinners.—The enmity of the human heart against God appears, not only from man's proud aversion to call upon his name, but from the delight, which in all ages men have taken in persecuting his inoffensive people: all however who engage in this attempt will prove their own folly; and the terrors, to which they have often been exposed, evince that they do violence to the light of their own consciences. However the poor believer may be derided for his confidence in God, he has obtained such a Refuge from every danger and enemy, as shall never make him ashamed: for God himself dwells among the righteous, and is their Protector in every generation.—All our acquaintance with the depravity of human nature, should endear to us "salvation out of Zion:"

and while we rejoice in the earnest, and are waiting for the completion, of our own salvation, we should long and pray for the enlargement and prosperity of the church. When that expected season shall arrive, that the Jews shall be re-admitted among the people of God; then indeed "will Jacob rejoice, and Israel be glad," and the event shall prove "as life from the dead" to the whole race of men. (Note, Rom. xi. 11—15.) But in heaven alone shall the whole company of the redeemed rejoice, without alloy or interruption for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM XV. V. 1. It is probable that, as soon as the ark was stationed on mount Zion, the Psalmist addressed himself to God; desirous of being taught who would be the accepted and persevering worshipper at his tabernacle. This was typical of the true church of God on earth; all the members of which are heirs also of heaven. (Note, Heb. xii. 22—25.) The enquiry, therefore, is virtually this: Who is he, that so worships God in this world, as to have a well grounded hope of eternal life hereafter? It is not enquired, what are the grounds of a sinner's acceptance with God: on this subject we are fully instructed in other parts of scripture: but the question is, What are the characteristic marks of those who are thus accepted, by which they may be distinguished from all other persons? And the answer is evidently in perfect consistency with the New Testament, and especially with St. John's first epistle, viz. 'They may be distinguished by their sanctification.' (Notes, 1 John ii. 3—6. 26—29. iii. 4—10. 18—24. v. 1—5.) Thus believers are conformed in their measure to Christ, the perfect exemplar: and the character, here given of them, forms a beautiful contrast to that of ungodly men, as delineated in the preceding psalm. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2, 3. "The fruits meet for repentance;" "the work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope," "the fruits of the Spirit," and "the things which accompany salvation," are here compendiously enumerated, or rather pointed out, in some of the most striking and observable particulars. (Notes, Luke iii. 10—14. Gal. v. 22—26. 1 Thes. i. 1—4. Heb. vi. 9, 10.)

V. 4. "The vile person" is an openly wicked and ungodly man, who renders himself base and contemptible by his crimes. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxv. 23—31. Dan. xi. 21.) Persons of this description may be exalted in station, and abound in wealth; and many will pay court to them: but the true servant of God will form a juster estimate of their character and state. He will neither envy their prosperity, nor give any sanction to their impiety. If they be magis-

V. 4. It is the opinion of learned men, that this psalm was composed when David lived among the Philistines; and when, perhaps, some of his associates were strongly tempted to join the idolatrous worship, which they witnessed. But he shewed them, that this would certainly bring on them additional miseries, by the just judgment of God. Adverting perhaps to Joshua's resolution, "As for me and my house we will serve the LORD;" (Note, Josh. xxiv. 15;) he avowed his determination to have no communion in such abominations, and not so much as to mention the names of their detestable idols.—We do not read of "drink-offerings of blood" in any other place. Either it was customary among the idolaters to taste the blood of the victims, (which were often human victims,) before it was poured out in honour of the idol; or they poured the blood, as the Israelites did wine, for a libation, on the sacrifice when burning on the altar: or else the wine, used in idolatrous sacrifices, was as abominable to God, as if the blood itself had been drunk; which, being the atonement for sin, was expressly prohibited to be tasted by the Israelites.—Even the sacrifices at the sanctuary of God at length became an abomination to those who rejected Christ; and to those who hastened after others professing to be the promised Messiah. In like manner, the most splendid services of those, who approach God through other mediators than Jesus Christ, whether deceased men, or angels, are, as idolatrous, an abomination to God. (Notes, Is. lxvi. 3, 4. Col. ii. 18, 19. Heb. x. 26, 27.)

V. 5, 6. JEHOVAH was David's present comfort, a Source of exultation and refreshment, as the cup of water to the thirsty, or of wine to the faint: he was also his future Inheritance; and he who allotted him his portion, would maintain him in it, and never leave him to forfeit it. As Canaan was divided by lot and line, these metaphors are used to represent his joy in the favour of God. (lxxviii. 55. Notes, xxiii. 5, 6. Num. xxvi. 53—56. Josh. xiii. 6.) But the Saviour himself has obtained the most goodly heritage; and his people are admitted to partake of it. (Notes, Matt. xxv. 19—23. Luke, xix. 11—27. Rev. ii. 20—22.)

V. 7. The Psalmist's meditation, experience, and chastisements, and the immediate communications of wisdom and knowledge, which he received during his midnight reflections and devotions, concurred with outward instructions, in counselling him, and teaching him to act, with prudence and caution, in his difficult circumstances. They likewise combined, in confirming him to choose God for his Portion. In the dark season of adversity and affliction, and when chastened with painful sickness, as well as in the silent hours of the night, heavenly wisdom was communicated to him.—The reins, or kidneys, were considered by the Israelites, as especially affected, by whatever caused uneasiness or satisfaction; nay, they are often spoken of as the seat of reflection and the secret purposes of the soul. (Marg. Ref. t.)

V. 8—11. David might perhaps have some regard to his own hope and experience, in these verses: but doubtless Christ was especially intended.—As Man, he relied on the power, truth, love, and promise of the Father: therefore he was not moved in his deepest sufferings; but "for the joy set before him, he endured the cross, and despised the shame." (Note, Heb. xii. 2, 3.) He willingly yielded to death, assured that his human soul should not be left in the place of separate spirits, nor his body in the grave till it began to corrupt; but that he should arise on the third day, and afterwards ascend to heaven, as the First-fruits of the Resurrection, and the Fore-runner of his people. Thus was he shewn "the path of life," and he pointed it out to his followers; even the way into the presence of God, where is fulness of joy: and he was seated at the right hand of the Father, where are pleasures, for him and for his people, for evermore.

In hell. (10) ἡνῶς: εἰς ἄδην. Sept. εἰς ἄδης. Acts ii. 27—32.—Many learned men interpret the two clauses of this verse to mean exactly the same thing, referring both of them to the body of Christ, laid in the grave, and raised before it saw corruption: but, as the article concerning 'Christ's descending into hell,' in the very ancient form called the apostle's creed, though doubtless of something later date than the apostolical age, is grounded on this expression, and the application of it; it is evident, that the compilers of it supposed that something further was intended than merely being buried. And the original (as well as the translation of the LXX quoted in the Acts of the Apostles,) favours the idea of a distinct meaning in each clause. Both the Hebrew word חַיָּה and the Greek αἴδης, by which it is constantly rendered, denote the state of man, when no longer seen on earth. 'When spoken of the body, they signify the grave;—when of the soul, they refer to that state in which the soul is without the body, whether Paradise or Hell, properly so called.' Archbp. Usher. The human nature of Christ consisted of body and soul: his soul was, during the space between his death and his resurrection, as certainly in the place of separate spirits, as his body was in the grave; but when he arose, they were both called forth and reunited. (Notes, Acts ii. 25—32. xiii. 24—37.) These words are never used, but with respect to men between death and the resurrection; and never concerning angels, or the state of men after the resurrection: nor are they ever used, when the burial or grave of an individual is spoken of. But they are applied, both with respect to the grave and the place of separation, to good and to bad men in general, without much discrimination: and the representation given in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, seems to place Lazarus as well as the rich man, in Hades; but in another division of it. (Notes, Luke xvi. 19—31.)—Thus the pagans placed their Elysium adjacent to Tartarus, as two parts in the same region of the dead.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our Lord and Saviour has shewn us, by his example, how to overcome temptations, and how we may be preserved through trials: we must trust in God, and pour out our prayers before him, as in Christ reconciled to every believer. But we must also remember continually, that all good comes from God, to whom the whole glory appertains; and that the most perfect obedience, of his noblest creatures, cannot render him their Debtor, or add to his felicity. What then are our defective and polluted services! Yet, when from our heart we avouch the God of heaven for our Lord, we shall for his sake do good to his people: and if we account them to be, as they really are, "the excellent of the earth," and delight in them, and in their prosperity; we may, after his example, in a subordinate degree, be very useful to them. And, as our righteousness and salvation were the purchase of his blood, we should not be reluctant to deny ourselves, to labour, or to suffer for that purpose.—Not only they who seek after other gods, but those who worship other mediators, and invent other methods of salvation than that revealed in the scripture, are hastening to multiply their own sorrows: God abhors their pompous and expensive superstitions and services; our great High Priest will not present such sacrifices, nor mention the names of such worshippers, in his continual intercession; and Christians should carefully avoid all fellowship with anti-christian delusions. They need not have recourse to these vain expedients, any more than to worldly vanities: for "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" is their God and Father in him; their present Comforter and their all-sufficient and eternal Portion; and he will maintain their lot, as well as that of their Surety, in defiance of the united power and policy of earth and hell. The poorest believer may therefore triumphantly say, "The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage." (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—39.) What thanks then are due to him, who has counselled us to make this happy choice; who has taught us to profit by our daily experience, and to find comfort in him in the hours of solitude, and in seasons of affliction! He who has learned to set God before him, to act as in his presence, and to rely on his watchful care and protection, may be sharply tried and tempted: but he cannot be moved; for the power, which upheld the Saviour, is engaged on his side. While our hearts rejoice in such blessings, let us use our tongues, as indeed "the glory" of our nature, in celebrating the praises of our God; while too many are proving their tongues to be "unruly evils full of deadly poison." And as the Saviour, the Holy One of God, saw not corruption, but arose the First-fruits of them that slept, and ascended into heaven to open for us the paths of life and salvation; so the believer need not fear, either lest his soul should be left to perish, or lest his body should remain in the grave. His flesh too may rest in hope; for though it see corruption, it shall be raised again incorruptible: and both body and soul shall be shewn the path of life, and admitted into the presence of God, "where is fulness of joy, and to his right hand, where are pleasures for evermore." Wherefore let us comfort ourselves and each other, with these words.

NOTES.

PSALM XVII. Title. The inscription found at the beginning of many of these sacred hymns, viz. "A psalm of David," may literally be rendered "A psalm to David;" and thence some have been led to think that he did not write all, or even most of them. But at the head of this psalm the same mode of expression is used; and consequently if those psalms were not composed by him, but only addressed to him, this psalm would be entitled "A prayer to David." This shews that our version is so far right; that the translation is of the same import as the original, which means A Psalm, ascribed to David, as its author.

V. 1—3. We shall not fully enter into the spirit of this psalm, unless we place ourselves in the circumstances of David. The whole tenour of it shews, that he has recorded his earnest meditation and prayer, at the most interesting crisis, when Saul, instigated by groundless suspicions, and false accusations, and pursuing him as a traitor, had surrounded him with his troops, and must have seized on him, had not God most wonderfully interposed. (Notes, liv. title. 1 Sam. xxiii. 19—28.)—The persecuted and slandered servant of God, in this extremity, appealed to his omnipotent Lord; and conscious, that he had in no respect deserved ill of his cruel enemy, he called upon God to “hear justice,” and to accept his prayer, which was not the language of deceit respecting men, or hypocrisy towards God. (Notes, cxlv. 18. Jer. iii.

6—11.) He besought him to pronounce sentence between him and Saul, according to his intimate acquaintance with the cause, as he knew that equity was on his side: for the Lord had long proved the heart of his servant;
he had seen his conduct and thoughts, even at midnight,
when traitors either meet to form their plans, or meditate how to carry them into execution. Indeed, circumstances had served to try him as by fire; seeing he had every temptation to seek opportunities of avenging himself. Yet God was witness, that nothing of this kind had been thought of by him; nay, he had avoided every disrespectful word concerning Saul, the Lord’s anointed; lest he should excite his followers to attempt ought against him.

V. 4, 5. “The works of men,” (of Adam, or of his descendants, as inheriting his fallen nature,) are those works to which they are propense; and among others, they have a strong propensity to “render evil for evil:” but David had so studied the oracles of God, that by regarding his promises and precepts, he had resisted every temptation to this conduct.—The word, rendered “destroyer,” signifies a robber or murderer: but the Psalmist seems not so much to have intended, that he had kept himself out of the reach of those who wished to murder him, or from the ways of Satan the destroyer; as that he had been kept from embracing any opportunity afforded him of killing Saul. And he still prayed, that he might be upheld, and not left to fall into so great a crime, however injured and tempted. (Notes, Ps. cxix. 114—117. 133. 1 Sam. ii. 9.)

—In the present circumstances of human nature, the ways of godliness are become slippery paths, through the artifices of Satan, and the snares of the world, combining with “the sin that dwelleth in us.”—In some of these things David may be considered as a type of Christ: he alone was universally and perfectly free from sin, and could say in the fullest sense, that a heart-searching God could find nothing wrong in him (3).

V. 6—8. (Marg. Ref.) “Make wonderful thy mercies, “O thou, who savest those that trust, from those who rise “up against, thy right hand” (7). This address to God, as the especial Protector of those, who trust in him, from those who rebel against him, is worthy of special notice.
In answering such prayers he acts according to his known character. (Rom. xv. 5. 13. Notes, 2 Cor. vii. 5—7. Heb.

which the Creator has secured the pupil of the eye, and by which every creature instinctively guards it from injury, forms a striking illustration of the Lord’s watchful care over his people, amidst the peculiar dangers to which they are on every side exposed. (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 10. Prov.
vii. 2. Zech. ii. 6—9.)

V. 9, 10. (Marg.) David’s persecutors were prosperous, self-indulgent, and luxurious; and thus they grew arrogant, impious, unfeeling, and presumptuous. (Notes, lxxiii.

V. 13—15. In this extremity, unless the Lord speedily interposed, (as one who had delayed till no more time could be lost,) to prevent Saul from accomplishing his wicked design, and to disappoint him of his prey, by some humiliating event; he would certainly take away David's life, and so render the promises of God of no effect: but this could not be.—Saul and his men had been as the “sword,” and “hand,” of God, by which he executed vengeance on many, and corrected others, in Israel; but they were mere mortal men of a worldly spirit, who preferred an earthly portion to the favour of God, and consequently had their good things in this life. God indeed gave them abundance of those treasures, which are commonly hidden for security, and spent in self-indulgence with their children. They were also full of children: and after living in plenty, nay, luxury, perhaps till old age; they left a numerous and flourishing family to inherit their riches: but they were not “rich towards God.” (Notes, xlix. 10, 11, 15—18. lxxiii. 11—14. Job. xxi. 7—22. xxvii. 13—23.) And would the Lord suffer his servant to be destroyed by such profane, selfish men?—The Psalmist however determined, whatever might be the event, to act as in the immediate presence of God, to maintain a good conscience, and to walk before God in righteousness: and then, whether he died soon, or lived many years, he should certainly at last obtain full satisfaction, when he awaked in the eternal world, or at the general resurrection, perfectly renewed to the divine image in righteousness and true holiness.—The former clause of the last verse is here interpreted of David's purpose, and only the latter of his prospect. Some explain both to mean his expectation of happiness in the eternal world; yet not excluding his hope of deliverance from his urgent dangers.—The Septuagint render the last clause; “I shall be satisfied in beholding thy glory.” (Notes, xxxvi. 5—9. cxix. 111. Matt. v. 6—8. 1 John iii. 1—3. Rev. xxi. 22—27. xxii. 2—5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Believers must follow their Saviour, in the way by which he passed through this world to glory; and such men as were his enemies will be their's also: but he was more hated, insulted, and cruelly intreated, than any of his followers ever were. They cannot, like Jesus, plead sinless perfection in any part or action of their lives; but through his merits and grace, they may “rejoice in the testimony of their conscience, to their simplicity and godly sincerity.” (Note, 2 Cor. i. 12—14.) They have right on their side, when oppressed or persecuted, their own hearts do not condemn them of hypocrisy; and therefore they have confidence before a just and merciful God: their prayers are not the language of dissembling lips, but the fervent desires of their hearts, and they may expect that he will give sentence in their behalf, when they are slandered and injured; even such an equal sentence, as must proceed from the presence of a holy God.—Unallowed evil, felt and mourned over, should in no wise weaken this confidence: but without conscious integrity in our conduct towards God and man, such appeals would be the most impious presumption. The Lord sees us in secret, visits us in the night, and witnesses our conduct in our most secret retirement, when solitude tempts the hypocrite to sin, and when the imagination is apt to roam after forbidden objects: and if he find one indulged and allowed iniquity, he will abhor our feigned devotions. We should therefore purpose not to offend with our lips, or even in our hearts.—We must not conform to the works of men, if we would escape the paths of the destroyer; for “broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be who go in thereat.” (Notes, Matt. vii. 13, 14. Rom. xii. 2. Eph. ii. 1, 2.) We must treasure up the precepts and promises of God's word in our hearts, for our direction and encouragement; and pray continually to be upheld by his grace, if we would walk in the paths of holiness: for our way through this evil world is very slippery; we are weak, and apt to be heedless; and our own watchfulness or resolutions, and former upright and consistent behaviour, cannot safely be depended on. But the Lord will incline his ears to those who call upon him: he has always magnified his loving-kindness to such as have trusted in him; upholding and defending them by his right hand from all their enemies; keeping them safer by his grace, than the pupil of the eye is kept by his providence; and with greater tenderness, than “the hen gathereth her chickens under her wings.” (Notes, Ruth ii. 11, 12. Matt. xxiii. 37—39.)—The profane, the sensual, and the proud, indeed are at all times their enemies; yet they are not always left to take an active part against them: but Satan is their most deadly foe: he is destitute of compassion, hardened in malice, and replete with subtlety; and concerning him we may pray in assured faith, “Arise, O LORD, disappoint him, and cast him down; deliver my soul from this wicked one.” He is indeed the sword, by which the Lord punishes his enemies, and scourges a guilty world; but his children shall not be given over to be a prey to him, nor to his instruments.—The most afflicted Christian needs not envy the most prosperous “men of the world, who have their portion in this life.” (Note, Luke xvi. 24—26.) They indeed receive from the Lord that abundant treasure, which they love to lay up securely for themselves; to spend in varied kinds of gratification, or hoard to aggrandize their families: and frequently the desires of their hearts in these matters are granted them. Yet they must die, and leave their good things behind them, to enter another world, where they have no portion but darkness and despair. But the believer walks here in the light of God's countenance, in a delightful attendance on his ordinances and obedience to his commands: he rejoices in the hope of glory; when he dies, his soul departs hence "to be with Christ which is far better;" and at the resurrection his body shall be raised incorruptible and glorious: and being completely changed into the image of his God and Saviour, he shall be eternally and perfectly satisfied with a happiness, large as his desires and capacities. Lord, teach us to "choose this good part, which shall never be taken from us." (Note and P. O. Luke x. 38—42.)

NOTES.

PSALM XVIII. Title. Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 1.

V. 1. This introductory verse is not found in the parallel passage in the second book of Samuel. The variations, between the two copies, seem to have been principally poetical improvements of the style, as few of them materially alter the sense, and several evidently render the composition more elegant. Indeed, the whole Psalm seems one of the most finished poetical compositions, extant in any language.—The word (פָּנָה) here rendered, "I will love thee," is peculiarly emphatical: "I will love thee with my inmost soul, and all its powers, and with the most fervent affections of my heart."—"I will greatly desire and long after thee." (Notes, lxiii. 1—4. cxvi. 1.)—The experience which the aged Psalmist had acquired, of the Lord's faithfulness, power, and love, no doubt excited the lively exercises of admiring and adoring love, as well as gratitude.—Some think that David spake in the person of the risen Redeemer, taking a retrospect of his sufferings and triumphs; and the words, in that view, convey a most interesting and animating reflection to the mind of the true Christian.

V. 2, 3. (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3.) 'As the Psalm so evidently throughout is a thanksgiving for past deliverances, the verbs in this verse (3) seem to require the same rendering which is given to them below, at ver. 6.' Bp. Horne. That is, they should be rendered in the past, and not in the future tense.—But perhaps the Psalmist meant to give the feelings and purpose of his heart, while struggling with his difficulties and overcoming them by faith, to which the event corresponded: for the words are plainly future; and a total disregard to the tense should not be supposed without evident necessity. (Notes, cxlii. title. Is. xxxviii. 9—13. Jon. ii. 1, 2.)

V. 4, 5. (Note, Sam. xxii. 5, 6.) The word rendered "sorrows," in these verses, signifies cords, or pangs, especially those of women in travail; and it is translated pangs in the Septuagint. And as St. Luke, in recording the apostle Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost, uses the same word concerning Christ, in respect of his resurrection, where it does not seem so apposite as cords or bonds would have been; it is supposed, that he refers to the Septuagint version of this Psalm. This is an additional proof, that it should be considered chiefly, as prophetic of his conflicts and triumphs. Note, Acts ii. 22—24.)

V. 6. This verse also is future in the original. (Note, 2, 3.) It varies from the parallel verse in Samuel, by using two nearly synonymous words, for "called" and "cried," while in the other copy the latter is merely a repetition of the former.

V. 7. The words "foundations of heaven," used in Samuel, is here changed for "foundations of the hills," or mountains. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. Two letters in the original, nearly alike, one used in Samuel, the other here, make the variation between the two copies: probably it was originally a trivial

36 Thou hast ^aenlarged my steps under me, that my ^bfeet did not slip.

37 I have ^bpursued mine enemies, and overtaken them: neither did I turn again till they were consumed.

38 I have ⁱwounded them, that they were not able to rise: they are fallen under my feet.

39 For thou hast ^kgirded me with strength unto the battle: ^lthou hast [†]subdued under me those that rose up against me.

40 Thou hast also given me ^mthe necks of mine enemies; ⁿthat I might destroy them that hate me.

41 They cried, ^obut there was none to save them; even unto the LORD, but he answered them not.

42 Then did ^pI beat them small as the dust before the wind: ^qI did cast them out as the dirt in the streets.

43 Thou hast delivered me ^rfrom the strivings of the people; and ^sthou hast made me the head of the heathen: ^ta people whom I have not known shall serve me.

44 ^aAs soon as they hear of me they shall obey me: the ^bstrangers shall submit themselves unto me.

45 The strangers shall ^afade away, ^uand ^bbe afraid out of their close places.

46 ^yThe LORD liveth; and ^zblessed be my Rock; and let ^athe God of my salvation be ^bexalted.

47 It is God that ^aavengeth me, and [†]subdueth the people unto me.

48 He delivereth me from mine enemies: yea, ^cthou liftest me up above those that rise up against me: thou hast delivered me from the ^dviolent man.

49 Therefore ^dwill I ^egive thanks unto thee, O LORD, among the heathen, ^eand sing praises unto thy name.

50 Great deliverance giveth he ^fto his King; and sheweth mercy ^gto his anointed, to David, and to his Seed for evermore.

PSALM XIX.

The heavens, and especially the sun, proclaim the Creator's glory to all lands, 1—6. The manifold excellence and usefulness of the word of God, 7—11. David prays to be delivered from his sins, and accepted in his services, 12—14.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

^aTHE heavens declare the glory of God; and ^bthe firmament sheweth his handy-work.

'mies are victorious; and to glorify him without reserve, 'when we are so.' Bp. Horne.

V. 49. St. Paul quotes this verse to prove, that the gentiles would glorify God for his mercy: (Note, Rom. xv. 8—13:) and this shews beyond a doubt, that he considered the Psalm as prophetic of Christ, and in some respects as his language. (Notes, xxii. 23—31.) Yet it is not advisable to apply every clause to him, so as to overlook his ancestor and type; who seems to have been led by the Holy Spirit, from speaking of his own conflicts and deliverances, to use language, which could never have its full accomplishment, but in his promised Seed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In David, the type, we may here behold Jesus our Redeemer, conflicting with enemies, compassed with sorrows, and with "floods of ungodly men," (Notes, Ps. xxii. 11—18. Matt. xxvii. 39—44,) enduring not only the pains of death, but the wrath of God for us: yet calling upon the Father with strong cries and tears; rescued from the grave with a tremendous earthquake, and various convulsions of nature; advanced to the mediatorial throne, and made Head of the heathen, as a recompence of his most perfect obedience even unto death; executing vengeance on the Jewish nation, beating them as small as the dust before the wind, and casting them out as the mire in the streets; and proceeding either to reconcile, or to put under his feet, all other enemies, till death the last enemy shall be destroyed. (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 20—28.) In the full assurance of these truths, and expectation of his appearing and his glory, we should hasten to submit willingly to his authority, and to embrace his salvation; we should trust in his merits, rejoice in his triumphs, and imitate his example. We also ought most fervently to love the Lord "our Strength and our Salvation;" we too should call on him in every trouble, and praise him for every deliverance; we should aim to walk with him in all righteousness and true holiness, approving our hearts unto him, and keeping ourselves from our own iniquities. May he arm us for every conflict, and aid us in all; may we make no league with sin, nor give quarter to any lust. By his strength may we leap over every interposing wall of difficulty; by his light may we pass through every dark valley; till at length we share the Saviour's resurrection and ascension into heaven: for if we belong unto him, he conquers and reigns for us, and we shall conquer and reign through him; and partake of the mercy of our anointed King, which is entailed on all his seed for evermore.

of mankind were wholly inexcusable. Even the Gentiles, to the remotest regions of the earth, were shewn the glory of God, by the heavens and the heavenly orbs, the benefit of which they received; but they forgot the Creator: Israel however had fuller and more adequate instructions from the sacred oracles. (Notes, cxlvii. 19, 20. Is. xl. 21-26. Jer. x. 11-15. Rom. i. 18-23.)

V. 2. The day and night, in constant rotation, instruct mankind in the knowledge of the glorious Creator; and each day and night, as it were, transmits this task to its successor: or they answer to each other, as when men sing in parts, alternately.

V. 3-6. The luminaries of heaven are not capable of articulate discourse, as man is; (which seems to be intimated by the abruptness of the original, "No speech, no language, their voice is not heard;") yet their instructions may be understood by every nation under heaven: and whilst other teachers are confined to some particular district, they preach to the whole human race. (Note, Rom. x. 18-21.) This is especially the case with the glorious sun, who has, as it were, his tabernacle pitched in the centre of the heavens. Thence every morning he issues forth, in all the vigour, alacrity, and beautiful adorning, with which a bridegroom would leave his chamber to go to his nuptials; and rejoices like an active racer, who glories in his strength, and anticipates the victory, when about to start for the prize. Thus he daily diffuses through the whole earth, light, warmth, and fertility; and preserves and invigorates all animal and vegetable life, and even penetrates by his piercing beams into the heart of the earth. (Notes, Gen. i. 14-19. Deut. iv. 19.)—The sun in the firmament may be considered as an emblem of "the Sun of righteousness," diffusing divine light and salvation by his gospel to the nations of the earth. He delights in communicating blessings to his church, which as a Bridegroom he has espoused to himself: and his course will be unwearied as that of the sun, till the whole earth be filled with his light and salvation. (Notes, lxxxiv. 11, 12. Mal. iv. 2, 3. John iii. 27-36.)

V. 7-11. The word, here translated "law," may be rendered doctrine; and be understood as a general name for divine revelation, as then extant, the law of Moses being the principal part of it. The whole of this is "perfect;" (Note, Deut. xxxii. 4;) and it is intended to convert the soul from sin and the world, to God and holiness; and thus to restore man from his fallen state. By it the Lord testifies to us all those truths, which relate to the mysteries and perfections of his nature, to our own state and character, to the way of salvation, and to the eternal world; with the invitations and promises connected with them. (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, Ps. cxix. 111. Is. viii. 20. 1 John v. 9-12.) This "testimony is sure," and entirely to be depended on; and the ignorant and unlearned, who seem most exposed to delusion, by unreservedly and simply crediting the word of God, become wise unto salvation, and learn to live a holy, useful, and happy life, in this evil world: whilst human reasonings on these subjects commonly bewilder men in error and uncertainty.—This sure testimony 'preserves ignorant souls from being seduced to worship the sun...; for it makes them, at the first word, so wise, as to understand that the LORD "created the heavens, as well as the earth." Bp. Patrick.—"The statutes" frequently mean the ordinances of God, by which Israel maintained communion with him, and received all blessings from him. These, though burdensome in themselves, under that dispensation, were entirely suited to its object, and proved a source of joy to the believing worshipper. (Marg. Ref. q.) But some explain the word in this place, to signify the laws given to regulate the conduct of magistrates, in administering justice; which were peculiarly equitable, and tended to render the nation happy. "The commandment," or the moral law, is "holy, just, and good," and spiritual; enlightening the mind to perceive what men should be and do, and how far they are from that holiness which it demands. Thus they learn their true character, are shut up under sin and condemnation, and are brought to welcome the divine Saviour, as well as to walk in newness of life. (Notes, Ex.

 "clean," as it sets the soul against all sin, and leads to holy watchfulness and diligence; and being once truly implanted in the soul, it will endure for ever. The term also may include the worship rendered to God, according to his word; which was free from all profane mixtures of superstition and idolatry, and far removed from the gross immoralities attending the religion of the surrounding nations. The obligation to this holy worship is perpetual;
 but the external form was varied, when the old dispensation was superseded by the new, and a more spiritual worship appointed.—"The judgments" commonly, in the books of Moses, denote the judicial law: (Notes, Ex. xxi.
 1. Deut. iv. 6—8. vi. 1:) but the term is used in various senses, in other parts of Scripture; and may include warnings, counsels, threatenings, and the instances given of divine wrath executed on sinners in different ways.—In every sense "the judgments of God were true and righteous altogether," without the least exception in any one particular. (Marg. Ref. z.)—Indeed, the sacred word, (even as David had it,) was in his judgment more valuable, because more useful, than much fine gold; and he found it more pleasant than honey to his taste. He loved the Scriptures, especially because they warned him to avoid sins and temptations: nay, the observance of them was its own abundant recompence; though it likewise entitled him to a gracious reward, in another world, the earnest of which he had richly experienced. (Notes, cxix. 97—105.
 Jam. i. 22—25.)

V. 12—14. From the consideration of the word of God, David's thoughts recurred to himself. Viewed in this glass, his errors or deviations, appeared innumerable;
 and he exclaimed, "Who can understand his errors?"
 Who can know, or find out, or recollect, all his failures of conformity to this perfect rule? He therefore not only desired to be pardoned, and cleansed from those sins, which he had discovered and confessed, but also from such as he had forgotten or overlooked: for, by "secret faults," he evidently meant the transgressions which had escaped his own notice, or vanished from his memory; and not those which had been kept secret from human observation.
 The treachery of his heart likewise appeared to him so great, that he feared being drawn aside into deliberate and presumptuous sins, the result of proud contempt of God, and being brought under the dominion of some powerful lust; and this dictated a fervent prayer to be kept back by divine grace from such dreadful crimes and consequences.
 (Notes, Num. xv. 30—36.) In this way he hoped to be preserved upright and innocent from the great offence of rebellion, idolatry, or apostasy: and he earnestly intreated, that "the words of his mouth, and the meditation of his "heart," might, by divine grace, be rendered such as might properly obtain a merciful acceptance in the sight of that holy Lord God, whom he entitled "his Strength, "and his Redeemer." (Note, Job xix. 23—27.) His dependence therefore was entirely the same as that of every Christian, who says, "Surely in the Lord" Jesus, "have

 "I righteousness and strength."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The heavens so declare the glory of God and proclaim his wisdom, power, and goodness, that atheists, infidels, idolaters, and all ungodly men, will be for ever left without excuse. Indeed, we may all learn profitable lessons from these constant teachers, who instruct, by day and night, men in every clime, and of every tongue. By considering these inanimate servants of our Creator, we may learn to adore his magnificence and liberality; we may be stirred up to cheerfulness, constancy, and diligence in doing good; and led to use our nobler gifts of reason and speech to proclaim his praise.—The transition is thence easy and natural to the contemplation of the Sun of righteousness, the Bridegroom of the church and Light of the world.
 While we walk in his holy light and consolations, and are made fruitful in good works by his genial influence; we should long and pray for that time, when he shall enlighten, cheer, and fructify every nation on earth with his blessed salvation. He shines upon us through his word: may he send forth more and more faithful ministers to publish it throughout the earth! Where that is truly received, "it "converteth the soul" from sin to God. May we heartily believe his "sure testimony," and imbibe heavenly wisdom from this pure and inexhaustible Fountain: may we rejoice in attending on all his ordinances; and thus receive communications of light, grace, strength, and consolation from the fulness of Christ, and render to the Lord the glory due unto his name. May we study and understand his enlightening commandments; examining ourselves by them, and walking with delight according to their holy instructions, while we embrace the precious promises, and daily plead them before our God. May his holy and purifying fear, which endures for ever, be deeply grafted in our hearts, that we may stand in awe of his righteous judgments, and be warned from every evil way; that we may flee for refuge to his gracious salvation, and have our consciences directed and our hearts encouraged by every part of his sacred word. Then shall we prize our Bibles more than all manner of riches, and find more delight in them than in all the pleasures of sense; being guided by them into that happy path, which leads to still more complete felicity in the eternal world.—But let it be observed, that the more any man studies and understands the holy scriptures, the more deeply will he be convinced of his own sinfulness, in thought, word, and deed: serious and frequent self-examination by this faithful mirror, will discover to him innumerable deviations from his perfect rule; and convince him that those, which have escaped his recollection or observation, are equally innumerable. This will induce him to cast himself unreservedly upon the mercy and grace of God, for deliverance from those sins which have been hitherto unnoticed by himself, or vanished from his recollection. He will also grow more jealous of his own heart, and more afraid of temptation, lest he should be drawn into presumptuous sins, and come under the dominion of them: and whilst he longs, more and more, to be preserved from every transgression, and that his thoughts, words, and works, may be acceptable to the Lord; he will feel more sensibly his own insufficiency for every good thing, and learn to depend more entirely upon Christ Jesus, as “made of God unto him, Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption;” and he will “rejoice and glory in him alone.” (Note, 1 Cor. i. 26—31.)

NOTES.

PSALM XX. V. 1, 2. This psalm was doubtless composed, and publicly sung, when David was about to engage in some perilous expedition: it is generally thought in that against the Ammonites and Syrians. (Notes, 2 Sam. x. 1 Chr. xix.)—The congregation of Israel thus prayed for the protection and success of their anointed king, to “the God of Jacob,” to that God who heard the patriarch in his distress, and was still the God of his posterity. (Note, Gen. xxxii. 27, 28.) Among them he had fixed his sanctuary, and the ark of the covenant, which had lately been removed to mount Zion; and from him, the great Object of their worship, as manifesting his glory above the mercy-seat, they sought help and victory. David was a type of Christ, in his conflicts and victories: and the psalm may be applied as a prayer of the ancient church for his coming, and of the Christian church, for the completion of his work, and the establishment of his kingdom, and for its enlargement and prosperity.

V. 3. The oblations at the sanctuary, when presented in humble faith and love, were graciously accepted, as typical of the Redeemer’s atoning sacrifice; and the answer, by fire from heaven consuming the victims, was the most

V. 4. David earnestly desired to promote the honour of God, and the welfare of Israel, by means of his counsels and undertakings; and it was proper for the people to pray for him in this expressive language. In respect of the designs of our great Redeemer, the words may be adopted in the most unreserved manner; but seldom in respect of other kings or princes.

V. 5. The king of Israel was their anointed deliverer; and when they went forth to war under his command, they might properly set up their banners in the name of the LORD, as well as “rejoice in his salvation.”—“In confidence of thy help, we will shout when we set on our enemies: ... for the Lord will not fail to grant the petitions of our sovereign, whose cause is so just, and who hath been so insolently treated by them.” Bp. Patrick.—As the king is immediately addressed, the meaning may be, ‘We shall rejoice in thy preservation, or deliverance (in salute tua);’ or, ‘in the deliverance, which we expect that thou wilt, in answer to our united prayers, accomplish for us.’

V. 6—8. David himself seems here to speak. His past deliverances and victories, and the loyal zeal of his people, assured him of success, from the power of Israel’s God. Comparing the confidence of his enemies in chariots and horses, and in well-appointed and numerous troops, with his own reliance, and that of his people, on the Almighty; he anticipated the triumph, and exulted as if already victorious.

His anointed. (6) “His Messiah.” David, as immediately chosen by God and anointed by Samuel, at his command, to be king of his people Israel, was a type of Christ, more directly than his successors in general were. (Note, John x. 32—39.)

V. 9. ‘Let the king of heaven hear, while we pray

PSALM XXI.

The king and people rejoice in God, and bless him for fully answering their largest prayers, 1—6; expressing the strongest assurance of future success, with the ruin of all enemies, 7—12; and calling upon God to exalt himself, that they might more and more sing his praises, 13.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No rank or character can exempt man from trouble; but the Lord will hear the prayers of the afflicted, and will support and deliver them. They who pray most fervently for themselves, put the greatest value on the prayers of others; and are encouraged by them in further calling upon God. His "name," his glorious perfections, (Notes, Ex. xxxiv. 5—7. Prov. xviii. 10, 11. Matt. xxviii. 18—20,) will be a sure Defence to all who, like Jacob, trust him and apply to him in their distress: but we should observe, that all our help comes out of Zion, from the mercy-seat, and through the accepted sacrifice of our Emmanuel, which all the legal burnt-offerings shadowed forth.—As far as our desires are spiritual, and our counsels holy, we may hope to have them granted and fulfilled; but it would be ruinous to have our sinful inclinations indulged.—Fervent united prayers tend much to the joyful assurance of faith and hope; and it is the first step to victory, in our spiritual warfare, to renounce all self-dependance and carnal confidence, and to trust only in the mercy and grace of God: thus we shall arise from our depth of misery, and obtain establishment; while all who trust in themselves will soon be brought down.—Happy is it for that people, whose rulers are influenced, in all their measures, by the faith and fear of God, aiming at his glory and the publick good; when they value the prayers of true Christians, and act with such justice, that pious men can unreservedly pray for their success; when they set up their banners in the name of God; and when they place their confidence, not in fleets and armies, but in his powerful protection. "From his holy heaven, with the saving strength of his "right hand," he will defend and prosper such as thus trust in him.—It is our duty to pray for our rulers, that they may be like David: we have great cause for thankfulness for our peculiar advantages in this respect; and we should continually intreat the Lord, that they who are or shall be placed over us, may be directed and prospered in every undertaking, for the honour of God, the peace and welfare of the land, and the common benefit of mankind.—In answer to the hopes and prayers of the old-testament church, the anointed King of God's people came in the appointed season: he was heard in the day of his trouble;

2 Thou hast given him ^d his heart's desire, and hast not withholden the request of his lips. Selah.

3 For thou ^e preventest him with ^f the blessings of goodness: ^g thou settest a crown of pure gold on his head.

4 ^h He asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him, even ⁱ length of days for ever and ever.

5 ^k His glory is great in thy salvation: ^l honour and majesty hast thou laid upon him.

his sacrifice was accepted; his intercessions have prevailed; his kingdom has been set up, and we are called to partake of its blessings. Thanksgivings for these benefits should be constantly rendered. In "his salvation let us rejoice," under him let us enlist, and in his name set up our banners. But we ought to recollect, that we belong to a large army, and we should not only seek and rejoice in hope of personal triumphs, but pray also for the success of the common cause; and look for the accomplishment of the Redeemer's whole counsel, when his dominion over willing subjects shall be extended throughout the earth.

NOTES.

PSALM XXI. V. 1. The former psalm was the prayer of Israel for David, and of the church for the Messiah; and this is a song of praise to God, who had answered those prayers. Several circumstances of the psalm may be accommodated to the case of David. Yet the whole seems more immediately intended for Christ and his kingdom.—"Many of the Hebrews themselves apply it to the 'Messiah. So that it may be called a psalm of triumph 'after the victories which David got over his enemies, 'which were a type of Christ's victory over death, and of 'the triumph that ensued. And truly there are some things 'in it, which are more literally fulfilled in Christ than in 'David.' Bp. Patrick.—David had risen to great authority: but he exulted and rejoiced in the strength and power of God, which had wrought many and great deliverances for him; which had made him the deliverer of Israel from all enemies, and was engaged for his eternal salvation.—Thus our Lord, being raised from the dead, entered on the "joy set before him;" which includes the salvation of his people, to the glory of God the Father, as well as his own exaltation to the mediatorial throne. (Note, Heb. xii. 2, 3.)

V. 2—5. God had, on all occasions, answered the prayers of his servant David; had prevented him, by directing Samuel to anoint him, as king of Israel, before he had thought of such an honour; and had made him successful and distinguished beyond his largest hopes. The Lord had not only very often preserved his life, in answer to his prayers, when in the most imminent danger; but had given him the assurance of continuing the kingdom in his family for many generations, and in Christ, as his Descendant, for ever; and he was encouraged personally to expect everlasting life in heaven. Thus his glory was 6 For thou hast * made him most blessed for ever: ^m thou hast [†] made him exceeding glad with thy countenance.

7 ^a For the king trusteth in the LORD, and, through the mercy of ^o the most High, ^p he shall not be moved.

8 ^q Thine hand shall find out all thine enemies: thy right hand shall find out those that hate thee.

9 ^r Thou shalt make them as a fiery oven in the time of thine anger: ^s the LORD shall swallow them up ^t in his wrath, and ^u the fire shall devour them.

10 ^x Their fruit shalt thou destroy from the earth, and their seed from among the children of men.

11 For they intended evil against thee: they ^y imagined a mischievous device, ^z which ^{aa} they are not able to perform.

12 ^a Therefore shalt thou ^b make them turn their ^c back, ^d when ^e thou shalt make ready ^f thine arrows upon thy strings against the face of them.

13 ^g Be thou exalted, LORD, in thine own strength: ^h so will we sing and praise thy power.

in all respects "great in God's salvation."—Yet the passage, in its fullest import, can only be accomplished in Christ himself.

Thou preventest. (3) Literally, Thou shalt prevent. This may be considered as the language of prophecy.

V. 6, 7. The marginal rendering, "Thou hast set him ^a to be blessings for evermore," is the most literal, and suggests another important thought on the subject. David was set to be blessings, not only to his own generation, and to his posterity, and to Israel for many ages; but, by these divine poems, to the whole church, while the world shall endure; and in Christ, his Son, to all eternity. (Note, Gen. xii. 1—3.)—David also enjoyed great felicity in the favour of God; and, trusting in his mercy, could not be moved, either in respect of his authority or his personal salvation. But the glory and dominion of Christ, to the praise of the glory of divine grace, are beyond the reach of all his enemies, and those of his church; and he especially "is set for blessings for evermore." (Note, lxxii. 17—19.)

V. 8—12. These verses indicate, that the haters and opposers of Israel's anointed king were likewise the enemies of God; who would assuredly take vengeance on them, and their posterity, in the most awful manner, making them the butt of his severest displeasure. (Notes, ii. 1—9.) But they may be considered as addressed to the Messiah himself; and no doubt, they receive their fullest accomplishment, in the judgments inflicted on the opposers and despisers of his authority and gospel. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, ex. 1. 5, 6. Luke xix. 11—27. 1 Cor. xv. 20—28. 2 Thes. i. 5—10. Rev. xx. 11—15.)

V. 13. Both the prosperity of the church, and the ruin of its enemies, tend to exalt God, or to render his glory conspicuous to his rational creatures. These effects can only be produced by his Omnipotence; which his people unitedly pray to see displayed, that they may joyfully celebrate his praises.—This conclusion greatly resembles the first petitions, and closing doxology, of the Lord's prayer. (Notes, Matt. vi. 9, 10, 13.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

If David rejoiced greatly in the honour conferred on him, as king of Israel; what is the joy of our Redeemer in his exaltation to the mediatorial throne, and in the salvation of his people! And if Israel, from love to David and his auspicious government, rejoiced, and praised God for him; how great should be our joy to behold by faith our Brother and Friend thus glorified, and our praises for all the blessings which we may expect from him! The Father was as ready to grant, as his beloved Son to ask, when he desired to be crowned, not with gold, but with glory and honour, and to have all things put under his feet; and to possess an unchangeable kingdom, for the benefit of his church: nay, our God "prevents" us sinners "with the blessings of his goodness;" and if we ask, he will give us "a crown of glory that fadeth not away," and "long life, even for ever and ever;" and the requests of the Saviour's lips are not withheld, while sinners are converted and believers established through his intercession. Words cannot express his glory in God's salvation, the honour and majesty which are laid upon him, and the adoration which is rendered to him by angels and saints above: yet he chiefly delights in his exalted state, as empowering him to confer "an exceeding and eternal weight of glory" on poor sinners, who here trust and love him. For, being made "most blessed himself for ever," he is constituted to be the Source of blessings, and "the Author of eternal salvation, to all them that obey him."—His kingdom is fixed on an immovable basis, upheld by the power of God; and the glorious display of the mercy of the Most High forms its grand object. But how will they escape, who are enemies to this glorious King and Saviour? The Jewish nation soon experienced the dreadful effects of his slighted love: and the condition of their posterity, from the siege and sack of Jerusalem to this day, awfully warns every one, not to entail miseries on his descendants, and bring destruction on himself, by opposing the Redeemer's kingdom, or neglecting his salvation. The discoveries however which will be made, and the vengeance which will be executed, at the day of judgment, on every enemy of Christ, will form the most tremendous comment on this psalm. In that day of his anger, all who hate him will be made as the fiery oven; they will be swallowed up and devoured; their devices will end in everlasting disappointment and despair; and all the arrows of the Almighty will be prepared, to execute his righteous vengeance upon

PSALM XXII.

David, prophetically speaking in the person of Christ, complains grievously, that he was forsaken by his God, and left to the insulting cruelty of his enemies; and he predicts many circumstances of the Messiah's sufferings, 1—21. He proclaims the name and praise of the Lord, calling on the people to trust and glorify him; and foretels the permanent success of the gospel, 22—31.

2 O my God, ^e I cry in the day-time, ^f but thou hearest not; and ^g in the night-season, and ^h am not silent.

5 They ^l cried unto thee, and were delivered: they trusted in thee, ^m and were not confounded.

salvation, as regardless of his agonies and prayers. Yet still he used the language of vigorous faith, conflicting with, and prevailing against, all despondency and impatience.—(Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. Matt. xxvi. 36—39. Mark xiv. 32—36. xv. 34—39. Luke xxii. 43, 44.) The abruptness of the latter part is remarkable: “Far from my salvation:” (marg.)—“the words of my roaring.”—How can this be?

V. 2. The Lord Jesus continued whole nights in prayer; he arose a great while before day for that purpose; and in the cold dark night he prostrated himself in the garden, and “prayed most earnestly:” yet did not the cup of his sufferings for sinners pass from him! He felt a natural reluctance to such tremendous sorrows, but his zeal and love prevailed; and when he added, “Not my will but thine be done,” he, as it were, retracted or at least qualified his former petition.—The prophecy expresses the feelings of his soul in the extremity of his suffering; yet his supplications were heard, as it soon appeared in his resurrection. (Notes, John xii. 27—33. xvii. 1—3. Heb. v. 7—10.)

V. 3. This verse seems to be admirably expressive of perfect resignation under the severest sufferings, which peculiarly accords with the prophetic meaning.—“Thou hearest not.”—Shall I then murmur, or impeach thy faithfulness? Far from it: “Thou, nevertheless, continuest holy, &c.” Thus our Lord, on the cross, declared the holiness of God in his sharpest sufferings: nay, he declared them to be a demonstration of it; for which he would be continually praised by Israel, more than for all the other deliverances, which they had received in answer to their faith and prayer.—Thou inhabitest, &c. In Israel, in the church exclusively, the works and perfections of God are celebrated; and there, on this account especially, he has, so to speak, his earthly residence.

V. 4—6. (Marg. Ref.) A worm, &c. (6) The Saviour here spake of the extremely abject state, to which he was reduced; in which he was treated as a worm, and patiently submitted to it; being humble, silent, and harmless, when oppressed and trodden under foot.—The language is very expressive of the contempt, with which he was treated by all ranks and orders of men, whether Jews or Gentiles. NOTES.

PSALM XXII. Title. “Aijeleth Shahaar” signifies The hind of the morning; (marg.) and various conjectures have been made concerning the intention of this singular title. Some think it merely a musical term; and others suppose it refers to the time when it was to be sung, rendering it “the first dawn.” Others apply it to Christ, as the Light of the world, whose rising was predicted.—But perhaps it points out the Saviour, marked by Satan from his birth for persecution, as the hind or hart is in the morning for chase; and so hunted down by his enemies, until he was surrounded by them, when he hung upon the cross. (Notes, 16—18. Matt. ii. 13—18. xxvii. 39—44. Luke xi. 53, 54. Acts iv. 23—28.) Of this the persecutions of David in his earlier years were a type.

V. 1. The first clause of this verse is exactly of the same import, with the words used by our Lord on the cross. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 46.) The Hebrew verb indeed is there changed for one supposed to be Syriack; but the Evangelist’s interpretation is given in the very words of the Septuagint. No reasonable doubt can be made, that he should be considered as the Speaker, throughout this whole prophetic psalm. It may even be questioned, whether David had any reference to his own case in it; as every thing is applicable to Christ, and most things utterly inapplicable to David.—While the man Jesus, without any personal transgression or defilement, but bearing our sins, in their guilt and punishment, was wholly deprived of all sensible comfort, and felt that horror in his soul which is the effect of the divine wrath; while the powers of darkness were permitted to assail him with every dreadful temptation; and while wicked men unrestrainedly exercised their cruel malice towards him; his God and Father seemed to have forsaken him, and to stand at a distance from his

V. 7, 8. The history of our Lord's sufferings is the best comment on this part of the prophecy: the language of the former verse might be thought historical of the insults attending his crucifixion; and that of the latter was adopted, without any variation at all affecting the sense, by the chief priests and rulers, to express their contempt of him, when hanging upon the cross. Little did they think, that the Spirit of prophecy, a thousand years before, had foretold that the murderers of the Messiah would speak of him, in this insulting and impious manner. (Notes, Job xvi. 4—16. xxx. 1—14. Matt. xxvi. 63—68. xxvii. 27—31. 39—44.)

V. 9, 10. David seems early to have devoted himself to God; but Jesus alone was a "holy child," born without sin. (Notes, lxxi. 17, 18. Is. vii. 15. Luke i. 34—38. ii. 41—52.) He was not only the peculiar care of Providence from his birth; but from his earliest infancy he exercised the most perfect faith, hope, and love towards his God and Father.

Thou didst make me hope. (9) מִבְּטִיחִי. "Didst keep me in safety." (Marg.) Confidere faciens me, vel, securum faciens me.

V. 11—13. A helpless infant, or a harmless lamb, surrounded by furious bulls and hungry lions, aptly represented the Saviour encompassed by his insulting and bloody persecutors; and in his extreme distress forsaken even by his disciples. (Notes, 16—18. Matt. xxvi. 40—56. Luke xxiii. 1—5. John xvi. 31—33. xviii. 1—3.)—The bulls, which fed in the fertile pastures of Bashan, were remarkably fat, strong, and furious; and they represented the Jewish rulers, who were rendered insolent by prosperity.—Gaped...with their mouths. (13) "Opened their mouths," (marg.) as a lion to devour the prey.

V. 14, 15. The dissolution of nature, and the unresisted sufferings of Christ, when "crucified through weakness," (Note, 2 Cor. xiii. 1—4,) are expressed, by his being "poured out as water:" the stretching of his body on the cross, and the violent motion with which it was erected, shook his body even to the dislocation of his bones. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 35.) His sense of the divine wrath against our sins, then laid upon him, added to all his other sufferings, made his heart faint and melt within him, as wax by the fire. Thus the vigour and moisture of his body were dried up, as with intense heat; his extreme thirst caused his tongue to cleave to his jaws; and he was brought down into the dust, by his death and burial. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 47—50. 57—61. Luke xxii. 44.)

V. 16—18. The rulers of the Jews were as strong bulls: the multitudes and soldiers were as so many ravenous dogs, who had inclosed this hunted hind, in order to glut themselves with his sufferings and his blood. (Note, Title.) "Our Lord...here setteth himself forth...under the image of an hart, or hind, roused early in the morning of his mortal life, hunted and chased all the day, and in the evening pulled down to the ground." Bp. Horne.—In nailing him to the cross, they pierced his hands and his feet: and when, emaciated by his labours and sufferings, he was stretched out almost naked on the cross, he might have numbered all his bones. The insulting multitudes stood around, and gratified their malice and curiosity by staring upon him; and the unfeeling soldiers, having shared his other garments, amused themselves with casting lots for his vesture. The manner in which his clothes were disposed of, being very remarkable, and occasioned by the peculiar texture of his coat, was thus circumstantially predicted! (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 35—44. John xix. 23, 24.)—Crucifixion, or nailing men to two transverse pieces of wood, by spikes driven through their hands and feet, seems to have been originally a Grecian or Roman punishment for slaves; at least it was not known in Judea, till many ages after this prophecy was delivered. Nothing, at all answering to the literal meaning of these terms, befell David, as far as we know; nothing could have been previously more unlikely, than that the promised and glorious Son of David should be treated in this cruel and ignominious manner: yet the fulfilment was so exact, that the verses seem more like a narrative than a prediction!—Let any thinking man recollect, that the Jews, the greatest opposers of Christianity ever since its promulgation, have unanimously allowed, that David wrote this psalm above a thousand years before the birth of Christ; then let him compare it with the history of his crucifixion, and determine, whether it does not stand as an unanswerable argument for the divine inspiration of the scriptures, and for the divine original of the Christian religion.

Pierced. (16) ¹⁶כָּאֵרִי: “as a lion my hands and my feet.” But this contains no clear sense at all. A very trivial change gives the reading of our version (כָּאֵרִי, or כָּרִי). The Septuagint, which is certainly more ancient than the Christian æra, renders it ῥαβδὸν χειρὸς καὶ ποδὸς; the Chaldee Paraphrast gives the same meaning; and there seems scarcely the shadow of a doubt, this is the genuine reading: though the general exactness of the Jews in preserving their scriptures, precludes the charge of an intentional alteration.

V. 19—21. In these verses, the Psalmist, (speaking in the person of the suffering Redeemer,) having stated the extremity of his case, renews his supplications; and earnestly prays to be delivered from the sword of divine justice, stretched forth against him, as our Surety; from Satan, the chief of those blood-hounds, or roaring lions, which pursued him; and from the enraged enemies, who like the fiercest wild beasts surrounded him, as if they aimed at his entire and final destruction.—My darling. (20) ²⁰יְהִיָּה; My united one. (xxxv. 17. Heb.) The feminine of ²⁰יְהִיָּה is rendered desolate; xxv. 16: only son; Gen. xxii. 2. 12. 16. Zech. xii. 10: only beloved; Prov. iv. 3.—Τὴν μονογενὴν μου. Sept.—Some think it refers to the human nature of Christ, as united to the Deity.

V. 22. This verse is expressly applied to our Lord by the apostle: (Note, Heb. ii. 10—13:) and the subsequent part of the psalm is as evidently prophetic of his glory and the success of his gospel, as the foregoing part is of his sufferings.—The whole psalm is allowed to be highly poetical; but this transition is peculiarly beautiful. For here the scene at once changes and brightens. The Saviour turns his eyes from his sufferings, to the glory which followed: (Notes, John xiii. 1—5. 31—35. xvii. 1—3:) and, anticipating the extensive and permanently blessed effects of his passion and exaltation, he breaks forth into exulting predictions and praises at the prospect. So that what follows seems descriptive of his feelings when he cried, “It is finished,” and, “Father into thy hands I commend my spirit.” (Notes, Luke xxiii. 44—49. John xix. 28—30.)

V. 23, 24. Some expositors think that these verses are the song of praise, which the Messiah declares he will lead in the midst of the congregation. Israel is especially addressed; but all who are favoured with the gospel are equally concerned in the exhortation, as the resurrection and consequent glory of Christ are the common benefit of all that fear and seek God: for had he despised and rejected the Surety's sufferings, and left him in the grave, all the hopes of sinners would have been for ever buried with him. (Notes, 2. Rom. iv. 23—25. viii. 32—34. 1 Cor. xv. 12—18. Heb. xiii. 20, 21.) But, though man despised and abhorred him, and the Father for a time seemed to disregard his sufferings and prayers; and though the character and conduct of those whom he represented, was abominable in the sight of God; he yet accepted the Saviour's atoning sacrifice, raised him from the dead, and made him “the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him.” (Note, Heb. v. 7—10.)

V. 25. Vows, &c. That is, the Saviour will publicly fulfil all the engagements of his exaltation, for the glory of God, and the benefit of his church; even as the Psalmist offered the various sacrifices, which he had vowed in his distress. (Notes, lvi. 12. lxxvi. 13, 14. cxvi. 14—19.)—The change in the person, from thee to him, is not uncommon. (27. Prov. i. 26—28.)

V. 26. The death of Christ was the great sacrifice for sin; his “flesh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed;” the poor in spirit feed on this provision, in their hearts by faith, and are satisfied: thus while they seek the Lord, they praise him also, and their hearts, or souls, are “preserved unto eternal life.” (Notes, John vi. 30—35. 47—58.)—The sacred feasts on the peace-offerings and vows, at the sanctuary, furnished this allusion.

the world, had forgotten, through alienation of heart, the one living and true God, and their relations and obligations to him, as their Creator, Governor, and Judge: but, through the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that followed, vast multitudes in the most distant nations, "remembered" God; and, forsaking their idols and iniquities, turned to him, as his worshippers and subjects. Thus the kingdom of God, which always was his by right, began in fact to be established among the nations: but this part of the prophecy has by no means yet received its grand accomplishment. (Notes, Rev. xi. 15-18. xx. 1-3.)

V. 29. Even the rich and powerful on earth are invited to this feast, and must feed on this spiritual provision, or they must starve: they must worship, and submit to the exalted Saviour, or perish: they, that persist in their rebellion, must bow as condemned criminals before his tribunal. The most exalted, and the most abased, are in this respect precisely in the same situation: none can preserve his body from death, or raise it again from the dust; none can quicken his own soul, or save it from final condemnation. In both respects, Christ alone is "the Resurrection and the Life;" and at length all that sleep in the dust must bow before his tribunal, and all his believing subjects will enter into his joy. (Notes, John v. 28, 29. xi. 20-27.)

V. 30, 31. Some in every age will be the servants of Christ: they shall be accounted, or registered, as a chosen generation to the Lord; (Is. liii. 10. Note, 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10;) and shall supplant the nation of Israel, though not descended from one common stock, being the children of God by a spiritual birth. (Notes, Is. lxvi. 7-9. 1 Pet. i. 22-25.) They shall come from every quarter to enlarge the church; one generation shall declare to another his righteousness and salvation; and his sufferings and death, and subsequent exaltation, shall be their favourite topics. (Notes, Is. xlv. 20-25. Rom. iii. 21-26. 2 Cor. v. 18-21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-21.

The stupendous scene here exhibited should attract our most serious and affectionate attention. Let us therefore step aside from worldly trifles, to "behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." Let us contemplate the depth of the Saviour's humiliation in connexion with his personal dignity; and his intense sufferings, contrasted with the infinite delight which the Father had in him, and with the combination of all excellences in his character. Let us hearken to his complaints and groans; let us attend to his strong crying and tears, to his agony and temptations, and to the cruelty and contempt with which he was treated by Jews and gentiles, priests, rulers, people, and soldiers; till ingenuity was exhausted, and malice itself fatigued, with mocking and tormenting him. Let us view this holy Saviour surrounded by bulls, lions, and ravenous dogs; in the palace of the high priest, and in the judgment-hall of Herod, and of Pilate. Let us next look to him as nailed to the cross, pouring out his blood like water; enquiring in doleful accents, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and complaining, "All my bones are out of joint, my heart is as wax, it is melted in the midst of my bowels;" till at length his death closed the awful scene, while nature also seemed expiring in convulsions. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 51-53.) What then do we learn from these astonishing events, and this extraordinary prediction of them? Here we behold the eternal justice and holiness of our God; the immutable excellency and obligation of his law; the inconceivable odiousness and guilt of sin; the inestimable worth of our souls; the ruined state of man, the insufficiency of all other expedients for magnifying the law, or satisfying the justice of God. We here learn the vanity of the world, and the misery of its deluded inhabitants; the dire malignity of the human heart, which naturally conceived and expressed such cruel hatred and contempt of him, who was "the Brightness of the Father's glory, and the express Image of his person:" we become acquainted with the infinitely free love and compassion of God the Father, and of our Lord Jesus Christ, for us wretched sinners: we perceive what is the Foundation of every human hope; the Source of all grace and consolation; the Exemplar to which we are to be conformed; together with the treatment that we are to expect from man, and the conduct under it which, as Christians, we are to adopt. In short, the whole system of true religion is here viewed in its central point; and every lesson is learned, with peculiar advantage, by the enlightened and humbled soul. (1 Cor. i. 23, 24.)

V. 22-31.

In this part of the psalm, viewed in connexion with the former, we behold the ransom accepted, the Saviour heard, and raised, and exalted to his glorious throne: we view him at the right hand of the Father, receiving inestimable gifts to bestow on sinful man, and not ashamed to call his poor disciples brethren; declaring among them, and by them to the world, the name and truths of God; fulfilling in his exaltation the design of all his sufferings; and calling on all, who fear and seek the Lord, to rejoice in him, and to praise and glorify him. (Note, Heb. ii. 10-13.) He now gives us his flesh and blood, to be the life-giving and preserving food of our souls: on this the meek and humble feed with delight, praise the Lord for it, and live for ever: and all, however powerful and honourable, who refuse this provision, and will not worship the exalted Saviour, must perish; for "the kingdom is the LORD's," and the once crucified Jesus is "the Governor among the nations;" and "no man can" by any means "keep alive his own soul." Whilst numbers despise, and wonder, and perish; a seed is, from age to age, raised up to serve the Redeemer, who are “accounted to the LORD for a chosen generation;” and who declare his righteousness and works of love, to those around them, and to those that shall succeed them. Thus the gentiles have been brought into his church, which is preserved in the midst of opposition: and ere long “all the ends of the earth shall remember, and turn unto the LORD, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him.”—Let the infidel then study this psalm with serious attention, and no longer object his futile cavils, in opposition to demonstration. Let those, who go about to establish their own righteousness, enquire why the beloved Son of God thus suffered, if their performances could atone for sin, or recommend a sinner to his offended God. Let the antinomian consider, whether the Saviour thus honoured the divine law, to purchase him the liberty of despising it. Let the careless take warning to flee from the wrath to come; and the trembling be encouraged, and rest their hopes upon this merciful Redeemer. The tempted and distressed believer should contemplate the scene, and learn to imitate the faith, patience, meekness, constancy, persevering prayers, fervent zeal, and love of the suffering Saviour; and cheerfully expect a happy event of every trial. Finally, let us never be ashamed to profess our faith in him and obligations to him, who condescends to own us as his brethren: but let us instruct our families in the important truths of his gospel, desiring above all things, and praying continually, that “they may be a seed to serve him;” and that all the ends of the earth may hear and receive his gospel, and become his believing and accepted servants and worshippers.

NOTES.

PSALM XXIII. V. 1—3. The preceding psalm represented “the good Shepherd laying down his life for the “sheep,” and assuming his pastoral charge: this describes their safety and felicity under his tender care. (Notes, John x. 1—18. 26—31.) For as Christ is “the good,” “the great,” “the chief Shepherd;” we cannot doubt that he is JEHOVAH, and is especially intended. (Notes, lxxx. 1. Is. xl. 9—11. Zech. xiii. 7. Acts xx. 28. Heb. xiii. 20, 21. 1 Pet. v. 1—4.)—A flock of sheep, gentle, harmless, and valuable, feeding in verdant pastures, or reclining, cheerful and satisfied, by gentle rivulets, under the care of a skilful, vigilant, and tender shepherd, forms the emblem of believers, brought back to the Shepherd of their souls, and by him guarded and provided for. (Notes, Luke xii. 32. 1 Pet. ii. 18—25.) He is JEHOVAH, the omnipresent, omniscient, almighty God, One with the Father, and every way able and willing to take care of them. His ordinances are their plenteous pastures, the consolations of his Holy Spirit are their refreshing waters. They are thus guided by their Shepherd into communion with God, and find rest to their souls. If they wander, he restores them by his kind rebukes, and his effectual grace: when their souls are diseased, he, as their Physician, recovers their health and vigour; and for the honour of his gospel, and the glory of his own name, he leads them in the paths of righteousness. (Note, Prov. viii. 20.)

V. 4. Between that part of the flock which is on earth, and that which is gone to heaven, death lies, like a deep valley, that must be passed in going from the one to the other. But this valley cannot hurt believers, and should not alarm them. It is indeed deep and dark, but fruitful. The good Shepherd will accompany his sheep through it, by his gracious presence: his rod, the token of his power, (Note, cx. 2,) will defend them from the assaults of their enemies; his pastoral staff, his word of promise, and Spirit of grace, will support them with inward strength; and thus he will render death safe and comfortable to them. (Notes, John xiv. 2, 3. Acts vii. 54—60.)—Thou art with me. Notes, Is. xli. 10—14. xliii. 1, 2. Matt. i. 22, 23. xxviii. 19, 20.

V. 5, 6. The people of God feast at his table on the provisions of his love; (Note, xxii. 26;) nor can Satan and wicked men, who hate and envy them, destroy their comforts, while they are anointed with the unction of the Holy Spirit, and drink of the cup of salvation, ever full and running over. Past experience teaches them to trust, “that the goodness and mercy of God will follow them all the days of their life.” It is their desire, expectation, and determination, to seek their happiness in the service of God here; and they hope to enjoy his love, without enemy or interruption, for length of days, even for ever in heaven hereafter.—The images in these verses are taken from feasts, and the general customs of anointing the guests, and distinguishing such as were most favoured by the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Experimental piety is the source of the purest comforts, and the most unshaken confidence; and cheerfulness greatly adorns and recommends it. What can they want, who have JEHOVAH for their Shepherd? What will that Saviour withhold from his friends, who shed his blood for them when enemies, that he might reconcile them to himself? Will not he, who ransomed our souls, provide for our bodies? Alas, our discontent and disconsolation spring from unbelief; and from a negligent or inconsistent conduct, which darkens our prospects and weakens our evidence. Let us then "give diligence to make our calling "and election sure:" let us simply trust our Shepherd's care, and listen to his voice: let us cultivate the gentle and amiable dispositions which these emblems suggest: let us keep close to his ordinances as the pasture of our souls;
and draw the waters of life "with joy from the wells of "salvation," seeking no other consolations: and let us earnestly plead with him "to lead us in the paths of right"eousness for his name's sake," to keep us from wandering, and to "restore our souls" from every deviation, by whatever means he may see good; for peace and happiness can be found in no other way. Thus, walking with God and trusting in him, we may think of death, as our appointed passage to eternal life, without fearing any evil:
the outward protection and inward supports of our gracious Friend will prevent all harm, and he will receive our souls to the mansion which he has prepared for them. While he pleases that we should continue here, he can make any situation pleasant, by the unction of his Spirit, and the joys of his salvation, in defiance of all our enemies: and the lively Christian will thankfully acknowledge the Lord's exuberant kindness, and declare his satisfaction in his care and love. Let us then thank him for the past and present, and trust him for the future: let us keep close to his service now; and simply repose our confidence in him, that his goodness will supply our every want, his mercy pardon all our sins, and relieve all our sorrows: that these shall follow us all the days of our life; and that we shall "dwell
"in the house of the LORD for ever;" in his presence,

NOTES.

PSALM XXIV. V. 1, 2. This psalm is supposed to have been written and sung, with some others, when David removed the ark to Jerusalem; and perhaps it might also be used when the ark was carried into Solomon's temple.
But the ascension of Christ into heaven seems to have been sublimely prefigured under those typical events.—The Psalmist introduced his subject by declaring the sovereignty of God over the whole world. (1 Cor. x. 26. 28.) He had formed both the earth and its inhabitants, and separated the dry land from the waters; by which it arose out of the floods, and seemed to have its foundation upon them. (Notes, xxxiii. 7, 8. xcv. 4, 5. Gen. i. 9, 10. Job xxxviii. 8—11. Prov. viii. 22—30. Jer. x. 11. 2 Pet. iii.
5—7.) The whole belonged to the great Creator, to be disposed of as he pleased: and he might most justly have cut off all the apostate race; or he might have taken another part of it instead of Israel. This introduction, therefore, seems to have been intended to excite the people's admiring gratitude, for the Lord's distinguishing kindness to them.

V. 3—6. External privileges were granted to Israel as a nation; but the character of the true Israelite was here enquired after. (Notes and P. O. Ps. xv.) A holy life, springing from a sanctified heart, free from external and mental idolatry, and all corrupt affections and carnal confidences, united with watchfulness against all hypocrisy and dissimulation; an exact punctuality and fidelity to every vow, profession, or engagement, to God or man;
—these things distinguished the acceptable worshippers from the rest of the congregation at the sanctuary, as they now do real from nominal Christians. This character originates from regeneration; and is gradually formed by the divine Spirit, through faith: and while others derive no benefit from divine ordinances, persons of this description
"receive the blessing from the LORD" continually; even "righteousness from the God of salvation." For "by the "Spirit they wait for the hope of righteousness through "faith." (Marg. Ref. n.) Thus it is very clearly stated, that while separation from sin, and a pious, conscientious

PSALM XXV.

David, trusting in God and waiting on him, prays for protection and guidance, 1—5. Pleading the conduct, prepare a man's heart for receiving divine blessings, and evidence his interest in them; they do not constitute his justifying righteousness, or merit the favour of God; in whom he must trust as the "God of his salvation," and from whom he must receive "the gift of righteousness by faith." (Notes, Is. liv. 15—17. Rom. iv. 14—22. x. 1—4. Gal. v. 1—6.) They, who thus trust and serve God, constitute the generation of those who seek him, as Jacob did, and so enjoy his favour, as "the God of Jacob." (Marg.) The clause is rendered in the old translation, "This is Jacob," the true seed of Abraham, the true Israel.—To interpret this of Christ exclusively, or at all, except as our example, supposes him to "receive righteousness from the God of his Salvation," instead of our being "made the righteousness of God in him."

V. 7—10. It is supposed, that the priests who bare the ark, and the Levites who attended them, demanded entrance into the tabernacle from those who kept the gates. The expression "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," may allude to the form in which the gates were made, the upper part lifting up, to render the entrance more spacious: the gates might be called "everlasting," because the ark was to have an abiding residence on mount Zion, where a durable temple was about to be erected. To this demand, the porters within answered in solemn strains, "Who is this King of glory?" and were again answered, that it was "the LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle;" that is, Israel's Protector and Friend, by whose power they were made victorious over all their enemies. The demand being then repeated, and a similar answer returned, the gates, we may suppose, were thrown open, and the symbol of the divine presence was carried into the holy of holies. (Notes, lxviii. 1—3. 2 Sam. vi. 14, 15. 1 Chr. xvi. 7. 34—36. 2 Chr. v. 12, 13.)—This may represent the Saviour at his ascension, demanding by his attendant angels admission into heaven, as Man and Mediator; yet at the same time as "the King of glory, and "the LORD strong and mighty." In human nature, and even on the cross, he had overcome and triumphed over the powers of darkness; and, ascending up on high, he led them captive at his chariot-wheels. To him the everlasting portals were lifted up, who was at the same time a Man, and "the LORD of hosts:" and as our Forerunner he entered heaven amidst the admiring acclamations of the whole angelick choir. And thus the gates of heavenly happiness were opened to every sinner, who receives Christ as his Lord and Saviour, assured that indeed he is "the LORD of hosts and the King of glory." (Notes, Eph. i. 15—23. Phil. ii. 9—11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As the earth, with its fulness and all its inhabitants, belongs to the great Creator, whose glorious wisdom, power, and goodness appear on every side; we should continually remember our obligations to love and serve him with all our powers, to receive all our comforts as his gifts, and to employ all which we possess, according to his will. This must also remind us of our need of his mercy, and lead us to continual humiliation before him: for which of his gifts have we not abused? which of our powers have we not employed in rebellion? (Note, Luke vii. 40—43.) If we had done all that was commanded us, we ought to say, "We are unprofitable servants." How absurd then for sinners to boast of their scanty and defective services! It is of the Lord's mercy, that any of us worship with acceptance, or may hope to enter into heaven.—We should be thankful for outward privileges: yet let us be careful not to trust in them; but seriously enquire, whether his word and ordinances have indeed been sanctifying to our hearts, and have taught us to "walk in newness of life;" whether we are weaned from the vanities of the world, and delivered from hypocrisy and deceit in our professions and engagements. The generation of those who seek and serve the God of Jacob, are formed to a peculiar character; the blessings of salvation and the crown of righteousness must be waited for, in the way of conscientious obedience; and they who expect them in any other way will find themselves awfully deluded. (Notes, Tit. ii. 11—14. Heb. x. 35—39. Jude 20, 21.)—The incarnate Word and Son of God, having completed his obedience and sufferings on earth as our Surety, has, in human nature, ascended up on high as a triumphant conqueror. The everlasting portals have been thrown open to receive him. He alone in human nature ascended thither by the merit of his own righteousness: but it is of infinite value, and merits for us also, if we believe in him. While angels adore, in the man Christ Jesus, "the King of glory and the LORD of hosts," and welcome him "as Head over all things to his church:" surely we cannot refuse him our thankful acclamations, or neglect to honour him, as we ought to honour the Father that sent him! (Note, John v. 20—23.) Let all remember that he is able to save and to destroy: "the LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle." If we refuse now to open our hearts to welcome him, he will at length refuse to open the gates of heaven to us; both at the hour of death, and when after the final judgment, he shall re-enter the heavenly palace with all the millions of his redeemed people. Then all unbelievers shall go "away into everlasting punishment."—Lord, open the everlasting doors of our souls by thy grace, that we may most thankfully receive thee as our Lord and Saviour, and be willingly and wholly thine; and that at length we may be 'numbered with thy saints in glory everlasting!'

NOTES.

PSALM XXV. V. 1. The repeated and deep confessions of sin, which are blended with the petitions and complaints throughout this psalm, favour the opinion of those, who think it was written during Absalom's rebellion, by which David's atrocious crimes in the matter of Uriah, as well as the sins of his youth, were brought to his remembrance.—The expression, "Unto thee do I lift up my soul," emphatically describes the nature of fervent prayer, when all dependence on creatures, and expectation from them, are sensibly renounced; and the earnest desires of the soul accompany the voice, but are indeed too large for utterance. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lxii. 8—10. 1 Sam. i. 12—16. Rom. viii. 24—27.)

V. 2, 3. These verses are rendered, in most versions, merely as a prayer throughout. Yet the third verse may be rendered more literally, "Yea, none who wait on thee shall be ashamed: they shall be ashamed who act perfidiously without cause."—David had given Saul and his adherents no just cause to hate and persecute him; nor had Absalom, or the rebellious Israelites, any cause for their treason and perfidy. Their hatred was not only unmerited, but directly contrary to his deserts. It was wholly free, or gratuitous. The Jews hated Christ without a cause, or freely: the same word being employed, as the apostle uses in respect of a sinner's justification before God, "Being justified freely." (Comp. John xv. 25. Rom. iii. 24. Gr.)

Yea let none, &c. (3) לֹא יִשְׁתָּחֶוּ. As if the Psalmist had subjoined to his foregoing request, 'Yea, I know that my prayer will be answered, as I am one who wait upon God, and none who do so shall be ashamed.' It is peculiarly animated and beautiful.

V. 4, 5. 'It is hard to know what to do in these difficult times, especially in this great agitation of thoughts, wherein my troubled mind is tossed up and down. Therefore do thou be pleased, O LORD, to shew me the course thou wouldst have me take, and govern my actions so, that they may be pleasing unto thee. I 'have as much need of thy guidance, as a little child has of its parents, and I cry as earnestly unto thee, that thou wilt direct me in every step.' Bp. Patrick.—To be guided in the path of faithfulness to men, of faith in God, and of inviolable adherence to truth and duty in such circumstances, was peculiarly desirable. For this blessing, more than for victory, David waited continually, all the day, and every day, on God his Saviour. (Notes, lxxxvi. 3—5. lxxxviii. 1, 2.)—The term, wait, implies a simple, dependent, expecting, attentive state of heart; which leads to frequency and perseverance in the use of proper means, notwithstanding delays and discouragements, with a determined rejection of all other confidences, and all inconsistent measures. (Notes, cxxx. 5, 6. Gen. xlix. 18. Lam. iii. 24—30. Jam. v. 7—11.)

V. 6, 7. The contrast between the Lord's "remembering his tender mercies, and loving kindnesses," which had always been exercised to his worshippers, and sprang from his everlasting love; and his not "remembering" the Psalmist's transgressions, is very expressive. When God thus remembers his mercies, he ceases to remember our sins; that is, he does not punish us for them. (Note, Jer. xxxi. 33, 34.)—The language also is peculiarly emphatical. The distinction between the sins of youth, thus brought afresh to remembrance, and later transgressions of which David was conscious, seems to fix the occasion of the psalm to have been as above stated. (Note, 1.) He could find no reason, in himself, why God should remember him in mercy; but he pleads with him to do it for his own goodness' sake. (Marg. Ref. s, t.)—Most of the verses in this Psalm begin with the Hebrew letters, in alphabetical order; (of which there are several instances in the Psalms;) but a few omissions and variations are found, which some ascribe to the perturbation of David's mind.

V. 8, 9. The goodness and mercy of God dispose him to be kind even to sinners; and instead of inflicting immediate vengeance, to use various methods of bringing them to repentance. He is "upright" and sincere in all his declarations and invitations, and he loves truth and justice; he is therefore ever ready to teach his ways of peace and holiness to all those, however sinful, who are humbly willing to learn them, that they may enter on them and walk in them. But the proud and obstinate, who feel no need of such instructions, or desires after them, and are not disposed to practise what they know, do not properly apply for divine teaching. And as the Master in this school is "meek and lowly in heart," and teaches with gentleness and wisdom; the scholars should surely be teachable, and learn in meekness and humility. (Notes, Matt. xi. 28—30. Jam. i. 19—21. P. O. Mark x. 1—16.)

V. 10. All the dealings of God with those who accept of his salvation according to his covenant of grace, and "walk with him," by faith in his truths and promises, and in obedience to his commandments, are the result of his wisdom, and consistent with his mercy and faithfulness; and therefore they will all eventually do them good, whatever present appearances may be. (Notes, ciii. 15—18. Is. lv. 1—3. lvi. 3—7. Rom. viii. 28—31.) Or the passage may mean, that all the commands and counsels of God, the paths in which he calls his people to walk with him, are good in themselves, and do good to the upright; and lead them to experience the fulfilment of his merciful and faithful promises.

V. 11. Had David's iniquity been great, and he had thought it but little, his plea would have been inadmissible: but his argument was, that "where sin had abounded, "grace might much more abound." (Notes, Rom. v. 20, 21. Eph. i. 3—8.) Thus the name, or perfections, of God would be displayed and glorified: and on this ground he hoped for pardon of his most atrocious sins, and on this alone; so that, if this plea did not prevail, he must sink in hopeless misery.—Some would render the clause "though it be great:" but certainly this is not the most obvious interpretation; and probably would not have been adduced, except either out of dislike to the doctrine implied in our version, or a fear of its being perverted. (Note, Rom. vi. 1, 2.)

V. 12, 13. It is said of all unconverted men, that "there is no fear of God before their eyes;" and that "the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom." (Notes, xxxvi. 1. cxi. 9, 10. Rom. iii. 9—18.)—Where then is that man, in this evil world, who truly reverences the authority of God, who fears his displeasure, and seeks his favour, as the main concern of his life? How disadvantageously soever he may be circumstanced; how great soever his past guilt, or his present darkness and discouragement; the God of all grace, who has excited this fear by his own preventing grace, will assuredly afford him the means of instruction, and enable him to profit by them: so that eventually, he "shall dwell at ease," or lodge in goodness (marg.); and shall find a never-failing source of comfort in the divine love, while he expects the complete felicity of heaven at last.—The inheritance of Canaan was a type of heaven: but indeed that man inherits the earth as far as it can profit him, who has food and raiment, and lives contented and in peace: and the man who "lives godly in "Christ Jesus," is also warranted to hope for the same blessings in behalf of his children, when about to leave them.

V. 14. The knowledge of the glory and harmony of the divine perfections, which encourages a sinner to trust and love a holy God; that sweet communion, which the believer enjoys with God his Saviour; and that peace and joy, which springs from the earnest of the Spirit, may be well called "The secret of the LORD:" and they lead the soul into a conciliating and satisfactory acquaintance with his purposes, and the wisdom and equity of them; and with the security and blessings of the new covenant, and the assurance of an interest in it. (Notes, Prov. iii. 32. Matt. xiii. 10—13. John xiv. 21—24. Col. iii. 1—4. Rev. ii. 17.) But none, except those who fear God, can possibly enjoy this satisfaction, which must still remain a secret to all ungodly men.—Several other discoveries of the secret plan and purposes of God, may also be intended, which none but the pious Christian can receive. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15, 16. (Notes, cxxi. 1, 2. cxxiii. 1, 2. cxxiv. 4—8. cxli. 8—10.) The word rendered "desolate" is the masculine of the noun, which, when feminine, is translated "my darling." (Note, xxii. 19—21.)—The Septuagint here render it, "only begotten;" as it certainly means in some places: but in this connexion it seems rather to imply the destitute condition of the Psalmist, when left alone, or forsaken by his former adherents and friends; and a fit type of Christ, as deserted by his disciples, and surrounded by his insulting enemies.

reminding him of his sins, which were thus visited on him, as Nathan had foretold. (Notes, 2 Sam. xii. 10—12.) He therefore united reiterated prayers for pardon, with his earnest requests for deliverance.—He was aware, that even his own son, and his bosom-counsellor, and a large part of the nation, thirsted for his blood; and would decline no violence, treachery, or cruelty, to destroy him: so that his life could be preserved only by the same divine power and mercy, in which he trusted for the salvation of his soul. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv—xviii.)

V. 21. In the sight of God, David pleaded guilty of great and many sins; but he had acted an upright part towards his unnatural son, and treacherous subjects. As a penitent likewise, he was “without guile,” and was determined to adopt no sinful measures for his preservation. And thus waiting on God, he trusted that he should be preserved.—“Integrity and uprightness shall preserve me.”

V. 22. The cause of the royal sufferer was that of his nation, and of true religion. While he was banished from Jerusalem, the people were oppressed, the wicked triumphed, and piety languished: and if the traitors succeeded, the event would exceedingly tend to obstruct the best interests of Israel. David therefore, in this prayer for the redemption of Israel from oppression, was a type of Christ interceding, amidst his personal sufferings, for his church; and for his own exaltation, as indispensably necessary to her interests, and to the salvation of his elect people. (Notes, li. 18, 19. cxxx. 7, 8. John xvii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—7.

In vain will our voice be lifted up in prayer, unless our souls be lifted up to God, in fervent desires and believing expectations.—They who trust in the Lord, will never be ashamed of their hope; nor shall any boasting or menacing enemies triumph over them. They will wait continually upon the Lord with their humble desires, and wait his time of granting them: and while others have the benefit of their prayers, thousands are praying for them, by character, if not by name. Their heavenly Advocate also presents his effectual intercessions: and a cause so pleaded cannot but prevail; as they who injure or hate them, without cause or provocation, will at length experience to their unspeakable shame and confusion. But we must be careful not to give our enemies so much as a plausible pretext for their malice; and for that reason should above all things be instant in praying, to be guided in the ways of truth and holiness. The most wise and experienced feel most their need of this continual teaching, and are most desirous of it; not only lest they should be wholly deceived, but lest they should be seduced into any paths of error or iniquity. They will therefore “wait all the day” on “the God of their salvation.” And his tender mercies, and his love to his people of old, will encourage them to

PSALM XXVI.

David professes his integrity, and his delight in the people and ordinances of God, with a solemn appeal come to him, that they may be remembered in the same gracious manner.—Recent transgressions followed by chastisements, if they have a proper effect, must lead most of us to recollect, and with shame confess, the sins of our youth, which are thus remembered against us: and thus we may humbly hope that the Lord will remember us according to his mercy, and blot them out “for his goodness’ sake.”

V. 8—22.

The most ignorant or atrocious sinner may properly be encouraged to trust in our gracious God, who in perfect sincerity invites all who hear to come to him. He delights in directing the sinner in the way of acceptance, and the believer in the paths of holiness: and when the heart is humbled, and the rebellious will subdued, the understanding shall be further enlightened to perceive the truths of God. He who has learned, in meek and humble teachableness, to sit at the Saviour’s feet and hear his word, shall soon be made acquainted with the secret comforts of true godliness, and shewn the nature and excellency of his everlasting covenant: and having acceded to it, and learned to walk with him in faith and obedience, according to its tenour; he shall find every one of the Lord’s dispensations towards him to be unmingled truth and mercy; not excepting his sharpest trials and severest corrections. The sudden recollection of the greatness of his iniquity may often assail his confidence; but faith in the Lord’s more abundant mercy can even convert that into an argument, why he should pardon.—Pride, obstinacy, and the love of sin, dictate all the complaints which are made of difficulty and uncertainty, in discovering the truth and will of God: for wherever there is a man who truly fears the Lord, he shall certainly be taught by the Holy Spirit the safe and happy way. He will surely be directed to the Saviour, and there find rest to his soul; and reposing his care and confidence upon his reconciled God, he will cheerfully wait for more complete joys in heaven; and commit his children also to the Lord, desiring his blessing for their inheritance. That we come short of this serene and happy life, is the effect of remaining unbelief and disobedience; and because we are so often heedlessly running into the snares of the world, and are thus caught by Satan’s wiles. Let us then look more entirely to God, that he would pluck our feet out of every net, and preserve us from every entangling care. Let us pray more earnestly, when we are most desolate of earthly comforts and comforters, or oppressed with sorrows; for the Lord is able to support and deliver us. He considers the number and cruel hatred of our enemies; and if either the injuries of man, or the temptations of Satan, render our prayers more frequent and fervent, they will eventually prove of great service to us. Let us especially pray for “integrity and uprightness of heart,” which will be our best preservative from dangers, delusions, and temptations; and secure

And, while we wait on the Lord about our own concerns, let us remember our brethren in tribulation, and pray for them also, that they may be redeemed from all their sins, enemies, temptations, and troubles; and that the church of God may be enlarged and prospered, and fill the whole earth.

NOTES.

PSALM XXVI. V. 1. It is the general opinion, and indeed it seems very probable, that this psalm was written by David, in Philistia. (Notes, cxli. title. 1 Sam. xxvii.)—Exposed to envenomed slanders and cruel persecutions, he had been driven from the ordinances of God, into the society of idolaters: but he appealed to him who searched all hearts, to judge between him and his enemies. He was conscious of having uniformly and perseveringly acted an upright part towards Saul, and in all other respects; and he had also trusted in God alone. (Notes, Ps. vii. 1—5. xxv. 1—3. xliii. 1. cxliii. 1, 2.) He therefore was confident, that he should not be left to fall into any of the snares which were laid for him; or in any future season of temptation.

V. 2. Try.] The original word (פָּרָה) is derived from the fire, with which metals are tried and purified: and it shews the earnest desire of the Psalmist, even by sharp trials, to have his character ascertained, and his holiness improved. (Notes, xvii. 1—3. cxxxix. 23, 24. Job xxiii. 8—12. Zech. xiii. 8, 9. 1 Pet. i. 6, 7. iv. 12—16.)

V. 3. By meditating on the kindness, mercy, and faithfulness of God, David had learned to copy them in his habitual conduct. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18.)

V. 5. Evil doers meet together for various purposes: but whether treacherous policy, or malignant enmity, or sensual and festive indulgence, formed the bond of their union, David hated their company, and shunned their assemblies. (Notes, Gen. xlix. 5—7. Prov. xiii. 20. 2 Cor. vi. 14—18.)

V. 6—8. By repentance and conscientious obedience, as well as by faith, expressed in attending on the typical purifications, the Psalmist purposed to prepare for offering those sacrifices, which prefigured the atonement of Christ; and especially for presenting his thank-offerings for deliverance, which he anticipated with cheerful hope. (Notes, xxiv. 3—6. l. 16—21. lxxiii. 12—14. Prov. xv. 8, 9. Is. i. 10—20. Matt. v. 23, 24. 1 Cor. xi. 29—34.) He trusted, that he should soon be restored to the land of Israel, and to the courts of God in which he greatly delighted; and while the worshippers compassed the altar, he purposed to celebrate the wonderful works of God in his behalf. (Notes, xxvii. 4—6. xlii. 1—3. lxiii. 1—4. lxxxiv. 1—3. 10. cxvi. 17—19.)—The glory of God was manifested at the sanctuary, from above the mercy-seat; and in those ordinances which typified the Redeemer. Thus the tent, where the ark was placed, might be considered as “the house of God,” in which his honour dwelt; where he met his worshippers and blessed them, and was glorified by them. (Marg. Ref. p.)

V. 9—11. As the Psalmist had thus by choice separated from the wicked, he prayed in faith and confidence that God would distinguish between him and them; especially referring to Saul, Doeg, and others who gave or received bribes, in order to murder him and his pious adherents. (Notes, lii. 1 Sam. xxii. 6—19.) In this conduct they resembled, and in some respects prefigured, Caiaphas, Judas, and the false witnesses and wicked priests, who combined to murder the Prince of life.—David, though conscious of integrity, and determined to persist in it, trusted only in the redeeming mercy and grace of God. (Note, iv. 3—5.)

V. 12. He, who confides in the gracious promises and providence of God, and cleaves stedfastly to him in upright and unreserved obedience, stands on firm and even ground, and may cheerfully bless and praise the Lord. (Notes, xxv. 21. xl. 1—5. Prov. x. 9. 1. Pet. i. 3—5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

According to that covenant which Jesus mediated, the man who “walketh in his integrity,” yet wholly trusts in mercy and grace, is evidenced to be in a state of acceptance: the Lord may be appealed to, to plead his cause: and he shall not slide, but “be kept by a divine power, “through faith unto salvation.” This man desires to have his inmost soul searched and proved to the uttermost. He is aware of the deceitfulness of his own heart, and desires to detect and mortify every sin; and he longs to be fully satisfied that he is a true believer. He examines himself; and is willing to be examined by the penetrating and distinguishing word of truth: but, lest after all he should be deceived, he appeals to the great Searcher of hearts; and in his better judgment, welcomes even those fiery trials, by which his graces may be manifested and improved, as gold and silver in the furnace. While he hopes in the loving-kindness and faithfulness of God, he sets them before him as his example, and seeks to be conformed to the holy truths which he believes. He is conscious that the society of profane, licentious, deceitful, or dissipated persons is become irksome to him. He does not frequent the haunts of evil-doers; and will stay no longer in worldly company than he can help. But he rejoices in the opportunity of attending on the ordinances of God, and meeting with his people. With serious preparation of heart, and in the exercise of repentance, faith, and a good conscience, he approaches the table of the Lord, to enjoy fellowship with him and his disciples; and to publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and to tell of all the wonders of redeeming love. Having loved the courts of the Lord, and every place and company, where his praises were displayed, and his glorious truths discoursed on; he would dread above all things the final doom of wicked men. A few hours with the covetous, malicious, and deceitful are very painful: eternity in such company would form a hell to him. This antipathy gives just confidence that his soul shall never be gathered with them, and animates him still to walk in his integrity, and to cry for mercy and complete redemption. Thus he feels his ground firm under him: and, as he delights in blessing God with his congregations on earth, he trusts that shortly he shall join the great assembly in heaven, in “singing praises to God and to “the Lamb for evermore.”

NOTES.

PSALM XXVII. V. 1—3. It is probable, that this psalm was composed by David, in the extremity of his danger from Saul, in order to silence the fears of his companions, by shewing them the strength and reasonableness of his confidence. (Note, xi. 1—3.) Some however, think it relates to his subsequent conflicts and dangers.—JEHOVAH himself was David's LIGHT, his Teacher, Guide, Comforter; “and his SALVATION,” both from temporal dangers and eternal misery: he was “the Strength of his “life,” his powerful Protector and Upholder; and therefore he had no reason to fear any enemies. (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3.) When, in former instances, his wicked persecutors had come against him in force and rage, as if they meant to devour him, (Note, Job xxxi. 29—32,) they stumbled and fell; and he was assured they would do so again: and, being confident that God was on his side, he was determined that he would not yield to fear, even if a whole army should march in battle-array, to wage the most desperate war against him. (iii. 6.) Compare this with the complaint of Saul. (1 Sam. xxviii. 15.)—When the malignant enemies of Christ came to seize him in his deepest humiliation, at one word of his they went backward and fell to the ground. (Note, John xviii. 4—9.)

V. 4—6. David was conscious, that the service of God was his choice, and, as it were, his element. (Note, xxvi. 6—8.) Though a brave soldier, a renowned commander and conqueror, and an anointed king; yet it was his one desire above all others, and his constant prayer and persevering endeavour, to dwell in, or at, the tabernacle of the Lord, where his ordinances were administered; which were types of the promised Messiah and his salvation, means of grace to believers, and acts of worship to God.

If he might choose for himself, he would spend all the days of his life in the courts of the Lord; that he might meditate with joy upon the beauty and glory of the divine perfections there displayed, (Notes, l. 1, 2. lxiii. 1—4,) and have constant opportunity of enquiring the will of God, by the high priest, and from his word; and that he might take shelter, as in the pavilion or royal tent of his heavenly King, where no enemy could find him, or would dare to approach him. Thus he hoped to be fixed as on a rock, immovable by changes or assaults. Indeed, though now driven from the courts of God, he was assured that he should at length be exalted above all his enemies, and be brought back again to the Sanctuary; when he would offer sacrifices of joy and thanksgiving, with animated and triumphant songs of praise and gratitude.

V. 8. This verse may be literally rendered, “My heart said unto thee, Seek ye my face: Thy face LORD will I seek.” In retired meditation, the exhortations of God to the sons of men to seek his face or favour, were recollected by the Psalmist: and his heart answered, ‘Dost thou deign thus to invite us? Then without delay or hesitation, I will seek thy face.’

V. 9. ‘Do not in anger reject my suits, because I am a sinner; but accept them, because I am thy servant; whom in former times thou hast so often relieved, that from thence also I am emboldened to beseech thee not to desert me; ... but ... continue to give me deliverance and safety.’ Bp. Patrick.—David expected eternal salvation from the tried mercy and truth of the God of his salvation; and this gave him confidence as to temporal deliverances. (Note, Ps. cxix. 121, 122.)

V. 10. Perhaps David’s parents died about this time, or he was deprived of the solace of their company: or he meant in general, that the favour of God would compensate the loss of all earthly friends, and of the nearest and most endeared relations; that the Lord would surely prove faithful, though they should prove cruel and treacherous; and that he was determined to stay his mind on God alone.

V. 11, 12. The Psalmist knew himself to be constantly beset with spies and false witnesses, who pried into all his actions, in order to find some handle against him; that they might gratify their cruel malice, under the pretence of justice: and this led him to pray frequently for heavenly wisdom, and that God would lead him in the path of uprightness, and at a distance from the “appearance of evil,” that so his observers (marg.) might be disappointed.—Thus the Son of David also was continually watched, that some accusation might be found against him; but his perfect holiness and wisdom completely frustrated and confounded his implacable foes, who thirsted for his blood. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. “Unless I had believed,”—the consequences must have been dreadful. The broken form of the sentence, adds greatly to the effect. Perhaps some person had asked David, how he kept up his spirits under his manifold trials and dangers: and he gave him this answer, as comprising the whole secret of his cheerful confidence.—“The land of the living,” in this connexion, seems to imply a prospect beyond this present dying world. (Marg. Ref. q.)

V. 14. Some understand this verse, as the Psalmist’s apostrophe to his own soul: but perhaps it was chiefly intended as an exhortation to his discouraged companions in tribulation; and also as a pious counsel to every one, who might at any future time read this admirable psalm. his salvation; and into an acquaintance with the dangers, snares, and enemies, which beset his path, and the manner in which they are to be avoided and overcome. He will uphold and protect their souls, and their lives also, as long as that is good for them; and he will keep them by his power through faith unto complete salvation. Happy are they, whose faith and hope are as vigorous as the security is valid. They need not fear armies of hostile assailants, or legions of infernal spirits, united for their destruction, with rage equal to their force. "In this they may be confident;" for "the eternal God is their Refuge." (Notes, Deut. xxxiii. 27—29.)—The temporary success of the wicked is only an introduction to their deeper disgrace and misery: they shall soon stumble, and fall, and rise no more: but the trials of believers will terminate in everlasting honour and felicity. Let us then in-treat the Lord to "give us faith, and to "increase our "faith;" that we may be delivered from tormenting fears, and honour our Protector by cheerful composure, when the hearts of others are shaken, as the trees of the wood are moved by the tempestuous wind. (Is. vii. 2.)—But the believer's confidence should be carefully distinguished from the hypocrite's presumption. Whatever be the Christian's rank, expectations, reputation, or employment; he considers the salvation and service of God, as his "one thing needful." (Note, Luke x. 38—42.) This he prays for and seeks after; for what is heartily desired will be diligently sought. He devises how he may dwell near the ordinances of God, that he may have constant access to them; for they are the rest of his soul, to which he returns with pleasure, when he has necessarily been called from them. He delights in contemplating the beauty and glory of the Lord, in the person of Jesus Christ; and he enquires his will, by studying his word, and praying for his teaching Spirit: he hides himself, from cares, and fears, and foes, in the presence-chamber of his King and Father, where no pursuer can discover him, or will venture to assault him; and while he drinks the waters, which flow from the Rock of ages, he fixes his hope and soul upon the Rock itself, for stability and support.—With such desires and experiences, we may triumph amidst conflicts, and "rejoice in tribulation." The Saviour, who suffered and conquered for us, will conquer by us: and, in hope of rendering eternal songs of praise in the temple above, we may now celebrate every mercy, with sacrifices of exulting joy and thanksgiving here on earth. But we should all be far more joyful and thankful, if we were more instant and fervent in prayer.—To the blessings of salvation the word of God invites sinners at large: yet, instead of attending to this call to seek his face, men turn their backs on him and his ways; for the heart of him alone, who is "born of God," echoes to the invitation, and says, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek:" he fears nothing so much as the hiding of his face, and being excluded from his service, or left to come short of his salvation: every token of his displeasure grieves him; and this renders him watchful and jealous of his own heart, and animates his supplications.—The loss of earthly friends, or their unkindness, or his anxiety about them, leads him more diligently to seek, and more highly to value, a relation to his heavenly Friend: and should his attachment to the Lord forfeit the favour of all his relatives, that loss would prove his richest gain. Let then the destitute, the orphan, and the widow, seek to the LORD, who is "a Father of the fatherless," and he will take them up; let us all seek to be taught and led in his ways, and in a plain path, that we may neither wander, nor stumble, nor cause our enemies to rejoice: and if we meet with the envenomed tongue of slander, or with cruel persecutions, let us remember "the man after God's own heart;" or rather let us look unto the suffering Saviour, and pray in faith not to be delivered up into the hands of our enemies. Having found the supports and comforts of the Lord's favour in times past; let us not faint, but "verily hope to see his goodness in the land of the living." Let us encourage others to "wait for the LORD," and not to yield to fear in the midst of dangers and enemies; for his grace will be sufficient for their support and deliverance. And whatever we may meet with in this dying world, he will strengthen our hearts; and we shall see and enjoy his goodness, "in the land of the living," in heaven, where sin and death never entered. Let us then, I say, encourage each other to "wait on the LORD," with patient expectation and with fervent prayer.

NOTES.

PSALM XXVIII. V. 1. It is not agreed, whether this psalm was written during David's persecutions from Saul, or at a later period of his life.—"Be not silent to me." "Treat not my humble requests with silent neglect."—The word (בֹּרַח) rendered "the pit" generally means the grave, when used in this manner: yet when the death of the wicked is thus expressed, it seems also to denote the place of future punishment; for all men go down into the grave, but the wicked into the pit of destruction. (lv. 23: נָאֵר שְׁחָה.)—If God did not shew, by some visible interposition, that he heard and answered David's prayers; he must soon be cut off and laid in the grave, never more to glorify God on earth; and it would appear, as if he died under the divine wrath, as the wicked do. (Marg. Ref. d.)—Had Christ continued in the grave, it might have been concluded, that he had been justly put to death: but he was justified and proved to be the Son of God by his resurrection. (Notes, Rom. i. 1—4. iv. 23—25. 1 Cor. xv. 12—18.)

V. 2. Holy oracle.] "The oracle of thy sanctuary." (Marg.) The place of the ark of the covenant, and the mercy-seat. (Notes, 1 Kings, vi. 15—22. viii. 28—30. Dan. vi. 10, 11.)

V. 3. "Draw me not away," as criminals are violently carried to the place of execution.—David deprecated the doom which awaited his deceitful persecutors, or that of Saul in particular. (Notes, xxvi. 9—11. xxxvi. 3, 4. lii. 1—5. Prov. xxvi. 23—27.)

V. 4, 5. The first of these verses is the language of prayer; the latter, that of prediction. In the one the Psalmist calls on God to "deliver" him, and plead the cause of true religion, by executing deserved punishment on his implacable enemies: in the other he assigns the reason, why he used this language; namely, because he foresaw this doom coming on them, and because their conduct shewed them to be given up to final hardness of heart.—In general we may and ought to pray, for the just punishment of all impenitent enemies of the church: but with particular application to individuals, such prayers can only be proper for inspired persons.—To be dealt with according to their deservings, must be most tremendous to every sinner. (Note, Jam. ii. 8—13.)—Regard not, &c. (5) Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, xcii. 4—7. Rom. i. 18—20.

V. 6, 7. This sudden transition from earnest prayers and the language of distress, to exulting joy and praise, accords so much to the method of those psalms, which are evidently prophetic of Christ, that some expositors interpret this of him; and suppose these verses to be spoken as an anticipation of the triumphs and glory, which followed his deep humiliation and sufferings. (Notes, xxii. 22—31.)—David himself, however, seems frequently to have anticipated the answer of his prayers in a similar manner: or perhaps after his deliverances, while leading the praises of his people, he contrasted the joyful scene with the dangers and sorrows, the prayers and tears, which preceded it.

V. 8. Some render this, "The LORD is Strength to 'them:'" (that is, to his people:) "and his Messiah, 'the strength of salvations is He.'"—It is not clear, that the original can bear this construction: but no doubt David had reference to Christ, whom he typified both in his conflicts and victories; and to the blessings of God conferred on his people through him.

V. 9. David's prayer for Israel was in some respects typical of Christ's intercession for his church.—The authority of a good prince resembles the care of a tender shepherd over his flock. The word rendered feed, therefore, means also rule: and is applied to JEHOVAH, to the Messiah, and to David, and others. (Marg. Ref. †—Notes, 2 Sam. v. 1, 2. Is. xl. 9—11. Jer. xxiii. 3, 4. Mic. v. 3, 4. vii. 4—17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

While others are troubling their fellow creatures with unavailing complaints; believers should, under distresses, cry the more earnestly to "the Rock of their salvation:" and they should not rest, till they have received some satisfactory token that their prayers are heard; for if the Lord could refuse to answer them, their case would resemble that of those, who have perished in their sins, to whose agonizing cries no gracious answer will be made for ever. But this can never befall those, who come to the mercy-seat of a reconciled God, in "the holy place not made 'with hands,'" through the intercession of our great High Priest; sincerely desiring and humbly hoping for those blessings, which he purchased by his meritorious sacrifice, and is now exalted to bestow. They will not however, merely deprecate the punishment which awaits the wicked, and the effects of their persecuting malice; but they will likewise earnestly pray, that they may not be drawn away by their enticements, to adopt their errors and imitate their sins; for the ungodly are more to be dreaded, when they "speak peace to their neighbours," than when they avow the mischief which is in their hearts. We may without hesitation predict, that impenitent sinners will ere long be recompensed according to their endeavours to do evil; and we cannot desire that the obstinate enemies of Christ should escape condign punishment. Indeed, if men duly regarded the works of the Lord, the displays of his power and majesty would intimidate them from rebellion, and "his goodness would lead them to repentance:" but alienation of heart from God causes men to neglect all his operations, and to despise even his redeeming love. He will however surely destroy such sinners, and not build them up, though for a time they prosper.—The servant of God is often encouraged to anticipate the answers of his prayers, while he is yet asking. When praising him for

NOTES.

PSALM XXIX. V. 1, 2. The Psalmist here calls on the mightiest princes of the earth, who demand homage, and sometimes worship, from men, to render glory to the universal Sovereign and Judge; and to come and pay their tribute of adoration at his sanctuary, in which he displayed the beauty and excellency of his holy character and perfections. (Notes, ii. 10—12. xcvi. 7—9. cxxxviii. 4, 5. cxlv. 3—7. cxlviii. 11—13.)—Beauty of holiness. (2) Or, his glorious sanctuary. (marg.) Note, 2 Chr. xx. 20, 21.

V. 3—11. It is probable that this psalm was composed during a violent storm of thunder and lightning, which reminded David, and led him earnestly to remind others, how mean and feeble the most mighty and honourable of the earth, were in comparison of the God of "glory and strength." (Notes, Job xxxvi. 22—33. xxxvii. 1—13. xl. 9—14. P. O. xxxvii. 1—13.)—'You,' (princes of the earth,)

'think there is great power in your words: but, as they 'can be heard but a little way, so they are of little force,
'in comparison with this mighty voice; wherein the Lord
'expresses how potent he is, and strikes a dread and hor'ror into all that hear it.' Bp. Patrick.—Thunder is often called the voice of God. (Ex. ix. 28. marg. Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 7—16. Rev. iv. 4, 5.) During a violent storm, he seems in glorious majesty to ride upon the many waters which form the clouds; and he shakes the ocean, as well as the earth. The power of the lightning equals the terror of the thunder: enormous cedars are shivered and scattered by it in a moment; the very mountains shake, and seem to move with agility, like a calf or a young rhinoceros, by means of tempests, or the earthquakes with which they are sometimes accompanied. The flames of the electrical fire, at the direction of the Almighty, are divided with inconceivable swiftness, and irresistible force; and even the wilderness is thrown into a trepidation. The hinds affrighted cast forth their young: and the forests are stripped, and their dark recesses laid open; the trees being shivered, their branches torn off, and the wild beasts affrighted in their dens.—But the people who worshipped God at his sanctuary, heard his voice from his word, which, though replete with encouragement, was more majestick and powerful than the thunder and lightning; and being secure under his protection, they spake of his glory, as displayed in all these terriffick events. For HE, who once directed the rising, continuance, and conclusion of the deluge, in the time of Noah; and who always bounds and directs the boisterous ocean; rules every tempest, and is established "King for ever:" and he will give protection, support, and peace with every blessing to all his faithful people. (Notes, xlv. 1—4. civ. 6—9. Gen. i. 9.

less alteration of the original, from אֵלֶיךָ hinds, to אֵלֶיךָ or אֵלֶיךָ oaks.—הָיָה or הָיָה seldom if ever means to tremble. The change leaves out one of the most interesting points in this truly sublime description of a thunder-storm; namely, its effects on the inhabitants of the forest: and the clause becomes little more than a repetition of what went before.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The mighty and honourable of the earth derive all their power and splendour from the eternal JEHOVAH: but, alas! few of them attempt to render to him the honour of his name, or “to worship him in the beauty of holiness.” They should, however, be reminded, that this is their highest privilege, interest, and happiness. The most exalted creatures indeed cannot render to the infinite God, their Creator and constant Benefactor, all “the glory which is due to him;” much less can any sinner: but when we come before him, as “in Christ reconciling the world unto himself,” adoring his majesty, submitting to his authority and righteousness, in genuine repentance and faith, and offering our spiritual sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving, and willing obedience; he will pardon and accept our defective services though infinitely beneath his majesty and excellency.—The majestick terror and destructive effects of thunders, lightnings, hurricanes, and earthquakes, with the consternation which they occasion; while they impress on us a sense of God’s omnipotence, and of man’s impotency, should lead us to think of the defenceless and desperate condition, to which the wicked will be reduced in the day of judgment. For the voice of the divine law, if duly attended to, would fill the consciences of sinners with more terror and amazement, than all the convulsions in nature; (Notes, Ex. xix. 16—20. xx. 18—20. Deut. v. 22—27. Heb. xii. 18—21;) and the effects of the word of God, when attended by the operations of his Holy Spirit, are far greater upon the souls of men, than that of thunder in the material world. (Heb. iv. 12.) By its energy the stoutest are made to tremble, the proudest are abased, the secrets of the heart are detected, sinners are converted; and the savage, the sensual, and the unclean, become harmless, gentle, and pure, resembling doves and lambs. If we have heard his voice, and fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us; if we have welcomed Christ as a Saviour, and submitted to him as our King for ever; if, relying on his merits, we are no longer terrified by “the ministration of death,” yet have learned to love him and keep his commandments: let us remember that it is the same glorious God our Saviour who causes the thunder; and the children need not fear their Father’s voice, when he speaks in anger to his enemies. they justly tremble, who are exposed without shelter to his vengeance: let us in his temple, his appointed refuge, (safe as Noah in the ark,) thank him for our security, and speak of his honour. “Let us give diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end;” and continually plead his promises, expecting that he will give us strength to resist temptation, to bear trials, to conquer enemies, and to perform every duty; and that he will bless us with a quiet conscience, a contented mind, and the “peace of God, which passeth all understanding;” that he will give us sweet composure even in the solemn hour of death, and exulting boldness amidst the dissolution of this visible creation, and in the “day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men:” knowing that our Saviour and King will rule even that flood of vengeance, and those tremendous convulsions; and that he hath prepared for us “new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.” (Note, 2 Pet. iii. 10—13.)

NOTES

PSALM XXX. Title. This title may be rendered, “A Psalm: a song at the dedication of the house for David.” When advanced to the throne, and possessed of mount Zion, the Psalmist built himself a house, which no doubt he dedicated to God, by fervent prayer and joyful thanksgivings; and perhaps by making a religious feast for his friends. (Note, Deut. xx. 5—9.) But there is nothing in this Psalm peculiarly appropriate to that occasion; and it was evidently composed either after a dangerous illness, or when he had experienced some extraordinary deliverance.—Many think, that it was used after Absalom’s rebellion, when David returned to Jerusalem; and, having purified his house from the defilement which had polluted it, he solemnly dedicated both it and himself to God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 1, 2. (Notes, xxxv. 17—19. 25—28. xli. 11—13.) Healed. (2) If this word be literally understood, a dangerous illness and an unexpected recovery, gave occasion to the Psalm. But some think the expression to be used figuratively, as no doubt it frequently is; and to denote a forlorn and homeless condition, like that of a sick man given over by physicians, and unable to help himself. The expectation of his death, formed by David’s enemies, and the joy and triumph which that event would have given them, peculiarly suit the state of things during Absalom’s rebellion. ‘unto others.’ Several words, varying in meaning, but all implying genuine piety and holiness, are translated “saints” in different parts of Scripture. By persons of this character, the holiness of God, (or his moral excellencies, as displayed in his word, and by his works,) is reflected on with admiring and grateful love, and celebrated with joyful praises. (Notes, Ex. xv. 11. Is. vi. 1—4. xxx. 8—11. Rev. iv. 6—8.)

V. 5. The concise manner in the original of this verse is very expressive. “For a moment in his anger; life in his favour: weeping may lodge in the evening; but singing in the morning.” No doubt this is meant exclusively of weeping penitents, or submissive suffering believers; and not of the ungodly or hypocritical. (Notes, ciii. 9. cxxvi. 5, 6. Matt. v. 4.)—We may here ‘see his clemency to his faithful servants: whom he may correct very sharply for a little time; but is soon reconciled, and then extends his favour to them without any end: and sends deliverance to them so unexpectedly and suddenly, as well as seasonably, that where nothing but lamentations were heard over night, there nothing but shouts of joy are heard in the morning.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 6—8. When the Psalmist had been delivered from Saul’s persecuting malice, and was settled peaceably in his kingdom, and rendered victorious over the enemies of Israel; he seems to have concluded, that his trials and dangers were over, and that he should thenceforth have uninterrupted peace. (Notes, 2 Sam. vii. 1—3. 18, 19. 26—29.) But while he ascribed his great prosperity, and the firm establishment of his authority, to the faithfulness, power, and love of God; he seems to have given way to unwarranted confidence, and to have remitted his vigilance and activity, and probably the fervency of his devotion. (Note, 2 Sam. xi. 1—5.) Thus he was gradually drawn into a course of inexpedient indulgence; and at length into most aggravated guilt, in the matter of Uriah, which threatened the final ruin of his comfort, reputation, authority, and family; and actually exposed him to sharp rebukes, anguish of spirit, and overwhelming domestick afflictions: till Absalom’s rebellion formed a sort of crisis in his case; and reduced him to such a humble, submissive, believing, and devout, state of mind, as prepared him for returning peace and comfort. (Notes, 2 Sam. xi—xx.) The Lord “hid his “face and he was troubled:” (Notes, x. 1. xiii. 1—4:) his deepest trouble, however, was but for a moment: his weeping, when both sins and sufferings combined to render him inconsolable, continued for a night, and joy came in the morning. God, in answer to his prayers, “restored to him the joy of his salvation;” (Note, li. 12, 13:) and he spent the rest of his days in a degree of prosperity, honour, and comfort, which, in so dreadful a case as his had been, was beyond what could at all have been expected.

V. 9, 10. If God had permitted his offending servant to be slain, or to die of disease; he could no more have served the cause of religion, or glorified him in his church on earth: but, if spared, he purposed to celebrate the mercy and truth of God among his people, and hoped thus to do essential service to Israel. (Notes, lxxi. 17, 18. lxxxviii. 10—12. Is. xxxviii. 17—22.) The concluding part of the first book of Chronicles, shews that his purposes and expectations were fully accomplished.

V. 11, 12. These verses illustrate the doctrine of the fifth verse, by the Psalmist’s own experience; whose case seemed as likely to form an exception to the general rule, as any that could well be conceived. The figurative language, used on the occasion, is highly descriptive of the most exulting gladness, and most animated, constant, and unmingled praises; such as are found in the six concluding Psalms. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, cxlv. 1, 2. cxlvi. 2.)—The tongue, when thus employed, is the distinguishing honour of our animal frame; and seems to be meant by “my glory.” (Comp. xvi. 9, with Acts ii. 26.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to dedicate all our possessions to him, who gave them to us: and our habitations should be daily entrusted to his care, and consecrated to his service, by the word of God and prayer; and by excluding from them, as far as we can, whatever is displeasing in his sight. And when our comforts have been interrupted, and are again restored; we should renew our dedication of them to the service of our God. But alas! how many houses, even of men called Christians, are not only destitute of religion, but are also scenes of such impiety and wickedness, that one might almost be led to conclude, they had been set apart to the

PSALM XXXI.

David avows his confidence in God, craves his help, and rejoices in his mercy, 1—8. He states his various trials, and blends his complaints with prayers, 9—18. He admires the goodness of God to those who fear him, and excites the saints to love and trust him, 19—24.

service of the devil!—In this militant state it calls for our admiring gratitude, when the Lord lifts us up out of one difficulty after another, and does not suffer our foes to rejoice over us. Returning health, or deliverance from imminent dangers, is peculiarly pleasant, when given in answer to fervent prayers. But the redemption of our souls from “the pit of destruction” calls for our greatest thankfulness; and he, who heard the Saviour in the depth of his distresses and raised him from the dead, will thus save and bless all his true disciples. Let us then praise God for that earnest and pledge of all our mercies and hopes, and call upon all the saints to join us in our hallelujahs. These may “rejoice at the remembrance of his holiness:” for as the Lord hates sin, and has taught them to hate it, his purity assures them, that he will wholly sanctify them; and all his perfections, according to his covenant of grace and mercy, afford security for their eternal salvation. His anger, which is everlasting against the impenitent, in respect of his offending children “endureth but for a moment.” He will frown, rebuke, and correct them, and they will mourn and repent; this may continue for a night, but joy will speedily return: and the renewed sense of his favour, which is their life and comfort, like the rising sun, will make it morning with their souls.—But let all beware of unwarranted confidence and carnal security: neither outward prosperity nor inward peace is here immovable: the Lord in his favour has fixed the believer's safety firm as the deep-rooted mountains; but in every thing else he may expect to be shaken, and to meet with temptations and afflictions. When we grow unwatchful, we fall into sin; and the Lord hides his face, our comforts droop, troubles assail, and perhaps our enemies insult over us. And to arise from such depths requires redoubled earnestness and diligence, renewed humble confessions, and fervent, importunate prayers. We should intreat the Lord, that we may not close our lives under his frown, in a way dishonourable to his name, or unprofitable to our brethren; and we may properly pray to have our lives spared, that we may yet praise him on earth and declare his truth. In this way our comforts will be again restored; the penitent's sackcloth will in due time be changed for the robe of salvation, and the garments of praise; (Note, Is. lxi. 10, 11;) and our tongues will be our glory, being employed to the glory of our God. But indeed the continuance of life, and even that of our bodies in the grave, will be but as a moment, compared with eternity; and whatever may befall us by the way, or however we come to the end of our course; if we have learned to love and praise God on earth, we shall exult in his favour and give him thanks for ever and ever.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXI. V. 1. It may be supposed that David wrote this Psalm, to encourage himself and his friends, during his extreme danger of being seized on by Saul, when he fled from Keilah: (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiii. 22—28;) or that he recollected his prayers, and meditations, and confidence, after his extraordinary deliverance, and thus recorded them, for the honour of God and the encouragement of his people: and we should realize these circumstances, which precluded all hope of escape by ordinary means, if we would enter into the spirit of the Psalmist, and perceive the strength of his faith and confidence in God. But David, in his greatest dangers and trials, expecting deliverance from God, was only a feeble type of the Saviour, in his extreme sufferings, his deep humiliation, and his prospect of the joy set before him.—The clause, rendered “Let me never be ashamed,” may signify “I shall by no means be ashamed for ever.” (Note, Is. xlv. 15—17.)

V. 2—4. David and his men had taken shelter in some natural strong-hold formed by a rock; but he was fully aware, that this hiding place “or house of defence,” now it was surrounded by Saul's army, must rather prevent than aid his escape. As, however, he had been used to make “the name of the LORD his strong Tower;” and as he considered the honour of the divine power, righteousness, and truth engaged on his side; he felt a confidence that he should be rescued by some extraordinary interposition of God. (Notes, xci. 1, 2. 9, 10. cxliv. 1, 2. Deut. xxxii. 3, 4. 30, 31. 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3.) Yet the case was urgent; and therefore he earnestly prayed to be answered speedily: and to be guided out of the intricacy, in which he was inclosed by his persecutors. For they had, as it were, caught him in a net by stratagem; and he had neither sagacity nor power sufficient to rescue himself out of their hands. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. Our blessed Saviour adopted the first clause of this verse, when expiring on the cross; and many things in the psalm may be applied to him. David evidently perceived himself to be in such constant danger, that he could have no security either to his life or soul, but by thus, day proaches, Ahithophel's counsel, and the other particulars of that eventful period. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv—xvii.)

V. 14. "I have said, Thou art my God;" that is, 'I have determined to seek all my salvation, my present security and comfort, and my eternal happiness, entirely from thy omnipotence and all-sufficiency, and in thy mercy, truth, and unchangeable love, as revealed in thy word.' (Notes, xvi. 2, 3. xxii. 1. lxxii. 1—4.)

V. 15. The Psalmist well knew, that the time of his troubles and deliverance, and the continuance and period of his life, were entirely at God's disposal: and, as he would not attempt to anticipate his appointed time by killing Saul, he was persuaded that Saul could not succeed in his attempts to slay him; and that infinite wisdom and love would bring about his deliverance, and advancement to the throne, when the proper season was arrived.—Thus the counsels and decrees of the Jewish rulers against our Lord were continually disappointed for several years, because "his time was not yet come." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, cxvi. 15. 1 Sam. xxvi. 8—12.)

V. 16. 'Till my time of deliverance, let thy manifested presence and favour cheer my heart and protect me, for the honour of thine abundant mercy.' (Note, Num. vi. 24—26.)

V. 17, 18. (Note, 1.) The language implies both prayer and prediction: it is that of triumphant confidence in God; and of assurance, that however closely dangers, or powerful enemies, or temptations may press, the event shall be happy and glorious: and, thus considered, it is perfectly justified from the charge of malevolent imprecation; unless foreseeing and predicting the destruction of the wicked be malevolence. (Notes, v. 10, 11. xxxv. 25—28. lxxvii. 1—3.)—The word righteous is singular: it especially marks David's strict integrity, while grievously slandered with insolent contempt; as typical of the Just and Holy One of God, who was reviled far more haughtily and despitefully. (Note, Jam. v. 1—6, end. 1 Pet. ii. 18—25.)—In the grave. (17) Note, xvi. 8—11.

V. 19, 20. David, in the midst of his troubles and imminent perils, found encouragement in admiring the goodness of God to those whom he had taught to fear and trust in him. Many effects of this goodness are openly shewn "before the sons of men," in the deliverances wrought for his servants on earth: immensely more are "laid up" for them in heaven for their eternal happiness; but which will be at last conferred on them before the assembled world. (Notes, Is. lxiv. 4. Col. i. 3—8. iii. 1—4. 1 Pet. i. 3—5.) Here the Lord preserves them by his powerful presence from their proud and envious foes, as in a "secret hiding place;" and he will keep them, as in a royal pavilion, (Note, xxvii. 4—6,) from all the effects of those slanderous reproaches which are cast on them, by those who contend with them and persecute them. (Notes, 17 Is. liv. 15—17.)

V. 21. Probably, David here referred to his deliverance, when Saul intended to besiege him in Keilah. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiii. 7—13. Is. xxvi. 1.)

V. 22. In my haste.] This seems especially suited to the hurry and agitation of the Psalmist's mind, and the imperfection of his faith, when he found himself environed by his powerful foes in the cave, to which he had fled for shelter. (Notes, cxvi. 10, 11. 1 Sam. xxiii. 22—28.) Before he had time for reflection and prayer, he hastily gave up all for lost. But meditation on the promises which God had made to him, with earnest supplication, calmed his soul; and eventually his prayers were fully answered.

V. 23, 24. The deliverance of David, so far exceeding

PSALM XXXII.

David shews the happiness of a pardoned sinner, all human probability, might well encourage the saints of the Lord to cleave to him in thankful, admiring love: for it was evident that the Lord preserved believers in every danger, and decidedly and awfully punished all their proud and ungodly persecutors. No circumstances of danger or temptation, therefore, should deject them or drive them from the path of duty: and in adhering to God, and relying on him, they would find their hearts supported and comforted with inward strength. (Notes, xxvii. 14. Luke xxii. 31—34. 2 Cor. i. 1—7.)—Saints. (23) Notes, iv. 3—5. xxx. 4.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The consciousness of trusting in God for every thing, on the warrant of his word, inspires confidence in danger, and suggests pleas in prayer: for it would not be honourable for the Lord, to leave those who thus rely on him to be ashamed of their hope. His justice induces him to deliver them from their unrighteous persecutors; his mercy, through the Redeemer's righteousness, will rescue them from final condemnation; and their earnest prayers will draw down promised blessings from their reconciled Father, as they stand in need of them. The Lord will protect and support all, who flee to him as their "Fortress," and build upon him as their "Rock of salvation:" for the honour of his own name he will guide such as desire to be led in his holy ways: and he will extricate from perplexities, and deliver out of temptations, those that call upon him, to pluck their feet out of every net and snare, which Satan and wicked men have privily laid in their path.—Every true Christian, having learned the worth of his soul, and the dangers to which it is exposed, has been led to entrust it as a sacred deposit to the care of the Almighty: but, considering the holiness and justice of God, and his own guilt and pollution, he would not dare to do so; did he not behold him as in Christ, his Redeemer, ready to forgive, and true to his covenant and promises. Thus encouraged, he continually commits his spirit into his hands, and, by daily experience, obtains a more firm persuasion of his power and willingness to save: and therefore, when death either seems to be at hand, or actually comes, he has confidence, in renewing this often-repeated transaction; and he desires to die resigning his spirit into the hands of his redeeming God. (Note, 2 Tim. i. 11, 12.) But those who desire this comfortable assurance, must abhor the fellowship of all such as regard lying vanities; and renounce all idolatrous, superstitious, and carnal confidences, on which such immense numbers depend. They must rejoice in the mercy of God alone; and in every affliction remember, that he considers their trouble. They should treasure up, for future use, their experiences of his having noticed, supported, and comforted their souls in adversity; and having delivered them, when they thought they had been "shut up in the hands of their enemy:" for every deliverance is an earnest of the complete salvation and felicity of the heavenly world. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 8—11.)

1, 2; and that penitent confessions alone can relieve the misery of the guilty conscience, and make way for comfort, 3—7. He instructs and warns sinners to repent, and believers to rejoice in God, 8—11.

V. 9—24.

In this present world, we may expect heavy trials one succeeding to another: yet it is our infirmity, "if our life" be spent with grief, and our years with sighing." Should pain, sickness, poverty, reproach, contempt, and persecution, come upon us, with combined force;—should our foes prevail, and our friends prove unfaithful, or afraid of owning or regarding us;—should any be so degraded from honourable or useful stations, as to be "forgotten like a "dead man," or "thrown aside as a broken vessel;"—should enmity unite with contempt, and slanderous accusation give countenance to conspiracy against our lives;—still we ought to remember that we have deserved more than all this, and to be thankful for deliverance from the wrath to come. We should also consider the man after God's own heart, and the treatment which he experienced: and especially we should "look unto Jesus," who was divinely wise, holy, and merciful; yet was more hated, despised, slandered, and afflicted, than we can be. Let us then follow the example of his resignation; remembering "that our times are in his hand;" and that support, comfort and deliverance will be vouchsafed whenever he pleases: nor can any suffering befall us otherwise, than our heavenly Father has appointed. Whilst we therefore give ourselves to meditation and prayer, we may profitably observe how the lying lips of Saul, Doeg, Ahithophel, and Judas, were put to silence in the grave: and thus will all be confounded, who menace, slander, or speak grievous things, with arrogance and contempt, against the righteous. Instead of yielding to impatience or despondency under our troubles; we should turn our thoughts to the surprising goodness of the Lord, towards those who fear and trust in him. For while their treasure is laid up for them out of the reach of all their enemies, their bodies, souls, reputations, and comforts, are under the protection of the Almighty; and they are "kept as in a strong city" (φρασεμενοι, 1 Pet. i. 5), through faith unto salvation." We should not therefore yield to unbelief, or hastily conclude, under discouraging circumstances, that we are cut off from before the eyes of the Lord; but we should ask, in humble confidence that he will hear and deliver. He will preserve his faithful people through life; and when they meet the stroke of death, and yield their bodies to the grave, Jesus will receive their souls, and at length raise their bodies, and bring them to be for ever with him in glory. Let all his saints therefore pray to be enabled patiently to suffer, and courageously to venture, for his sake; for he will comfort and strengthen the hearts of all, who hope in him: whilst the proud despiser of his gospel, and persecutor of his people, shall meet with an abundant recompense of his evil deeds; and be for ever shut up, without possibility of release, in the hand of his cruel enemy, and in the unquenchable fire.—Lord, pardon our complaints and fears; increase our faith, patience, love, and gratitude; and teach us to rejoice in tribulation, and in hope of thine eternal glory.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXII. Maschil. (מַשְׁכִּיל, אֶפְסָל; in high. intellexit, vel intelligere fecit.) This title seems to imply, that the Psalm contains peculiarly important instruction: and indeed it teaches the way by which miserable sinners become happy, and the nature and effects of true repentance. Twelve other psalms have the same title, the subjects of which are various; but all replete with instruction. Some have thought, that the word maschil shewed the musick to which the psalm was set; but this is by no means satisfactory.—This is one of the seven penitential psalms: and though the special occasion of it is not mentioned, it is generally supposed to refer to David's sin in the matter of Uriah, and his subsequent repentance. It seems to have been written some time after the fifty-first, and when God had “restored to him the joy of his salvation.” (Note, li. 12, 13.)

V. 1, 2. (Note, i. 1—3.) Sin is the only cause of misery; and forgiveness is the commencement of a sinner's happiness: as he that had obtained the king's pardon would be allowed to be the happiest, even though the poorest, in a company of condemned malefactors. The believer's transgressions of the divine law are all forgiven, being covered with the atonement. Christ bare his iniquities, and therefore they are not imputed to the believer, as to any of their penal consequences: nay, “righteousness without works” is imputed, and as a righteous person, the reward is adjudged to him: hence all his present comforts, and hopes of future felicity. (Notes, Rom. iv. 4—8.) But his character, as well as his privilege, is emphatically marked: “in his spirit there is no guile.” His professed repentance, faith, and love are undissembled: he means all that his words express, when he humbly confesses his sins and earnestly prays to be delivered from them. He is no hypocrite or formalist in his worship; but is indeed the same before God as he appears to be before men; a sinner trusting in his mercy through the atoning blood, and seeking sanctification by the power of the Holy Spirit. He does not profess to repent, with intention to sin again; nor does he indulge in sin because God is ready to forgive. Others will thus abuse the doctrine of free grace; but he cannot: he is “an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile.” (Notes, John i. 47—51. 1 Pet. ii. 1—3. Rev. xiv. 1—5.)—“Happy is that man, thrice happy, to whom ‘God will be pleased, out of his own free grace and mercy, ‘(for no man can merit such a favour by any services that ‘we can do him,) to remit not only his common errors,

“... but also his grosser sins. ... Who doth not only ‘seem, by his sorrowful confessions to hate and abhor ‘them; but is unfeignedly resolved to forsake them.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 3—5. It seems that David, before Nathan came to him, had often been exceedingly tortured in his conscience, on account of the atrocious crimes which he had committed; (Notes, 2 Sam. xi. 27. xii. 1—6;) yet reluctance to humble himself before God, or to be considered as a criminal by men, led him to “keep silence,” or only to give vent to his anguish by solitary bemoanings, “roaring as a ‘lion which has received a deadly wound;’ and endeavouring, no doubt at the same time, by one sophistical excuse or other, to palliate his guilt to himself, and to be on better terms with his conscience. But this stubborn and rebellious conduct served only to prolong and enhance his misery. His secret remorse and conflict, not only preyed on his spirit, but impaired his health, and rendered him infirm in his bones or limbs, as through old age. Neither business nor pleasure during the day, nor his couch by night, could relieve his inward anguish; which was rendered more exquisite by the pains taken to conceal it. Thus the hand of God was “heavy upon him:” (Marg. Ref. i.;) and it is probable, some additional distressing malady was superadded to the natural effects of his inward conflicts; so that he, who was before vigorous and healthy, wasted away, till he resembled the parched land in the drought of summer. (Notes, xxx. 1, 2. xxxviii. 1—10. xli. 1—8.) But at length, being brought to a more proper frame of mind, he resolved humbly to submit himself to God; and to make full and ingenuous confession of his aggravated crimes, without attempting any excuse, or palliation. Having done this, the “iniquity,” or injustice, of his sin was pardoned, his burden was speedily removed, and at length his comforts were restored; and he recorded these things with a mark of peculiar emphasis, Selah, that others might profit by his painful and by his joyful experience (Notes, Jer. xxxi. 18—20. Luke xv. 13—24. 1 John i. 8—10.)

ing how readily God forgave the heinous guilt of David, when he was brought to ingenuous confession and deep repentance; would be encouraged to copy his example, and learn to pray in faith and hope, “in a time when God might be found.”—While his word is brought home to the conscience, and the Holy Spirit strives with the sinner, by painful convictions and terrors, or draws him to hope for mercy; it is especially “a time of finding,” (marg.) “an acceptable time,” “a day of visitation,” a critical season in his experience. In some respects, this life is a “time of finding,” except to such as are judicially hardened: but in another world, God will no more be found on a mercy-seat, waiting to be gracious; but as an avenging Judge to all the impenitent. (Notes, Is. xlix. 7, 8. lv. 6, 7. Luke xiii. 22—30. xix. 41—44. John xii. 34—36. 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2. Heb. iii. 7—13.)—They however, who, as David supposed, might by his example be animated to seize the invaluable opportunity, would be received into favour; and, secure of protection, (like Noah in the ark, during the deluge,) could be approached by no overwhelming troubles, temptations, or enemies; or by those judgments and that vengeance, which overtook the wicked and hurried them into destruction. (Notes, Matt. vii. 24—27. Luke vi. 46—49.)—In this happiness the Psalmist rejoiced: and he daily received so many mercies, which he celebrated with songs of deliverance, that he was wholly compassed about with them.

V. 8—11. David, in the name of God, here offered to instruct those who would regard him; and, by his experience and attention, to shew them the way of happiness; keeping his eye still upon them and counselling them. Or, the Lord himself, by his prophet, promises to be the Teacher and watchful Guide of all, who desire to walk in his ways. Some understand it, as the word of God to David, inducing him to repentance.—When horses or mules prove refractory and mischievous, force and skill are used to subdue and restrain them: and they are exposed to much severe discipline, to render them tractable, and to prevent them from doing mischief, instead of service, to their possessors.—Thus obstinate sinners, in as irrational a manner, render sharp usage necessary, either to preserve them from ruin, or to restrain them from injuring others. So that their sorrows are multiplied, as the deliverances and praises of the righteous are enhanced.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All men would be happy: but they vainly expect that riches, pleasures, and worldly honours can confer satisfaction; and when disappointed, they change one vanity for another: so that he, and he alone, who attends to the word of God, seeks felicity successfully. His mercy, through the great Redeemer, revealed in the scriptures, brings the first report of the sinner's happiness; faith receives this report, renounces worldly idols and false confidences, and seeks forgiveness and righteousness in the Saviour's name. But pride and stoutness of heart; aversion to God and his holy character and spiritual worship; and unbelief, either absolutely, or to a considerable degree, prevailing in the heart; keep back from unreserved submission, ingenuous confession, and fervent prayer, numbers who are deeply distressed with a sense of guilt. They “keep silence,” and brood in secret over their terrors and sorrows, which they endeavour to conceal under an assumed and hypocritical cheerfulness: while in solitude they feel, and sometimes mourn over, their misery, with horror and remorse, in the most doleful lamentations and fruitless wishes. In this way many are at length driven to despair and suicide: but far more seek relief from a condemning conscience, by having recourse to infidelity, or some corrupt system, which excuses or explains away the evil of sin; and so enables them to keep up a delusive hope of being happy, or at least of escaping misery, without “repentance and works meet for repentance.” When, however, God is pleased to visit the soul with his special grace, he sends his word, not only by a Nathan to the outward ear, with “Thou art the man;” but by his Holy Spirit to the inmost soul: (Note, 2 Sam. xii. 7:) and then godly sorrow, unfeigned submission, ingenuous confessions, and believing prayers for mercy and forgiveness through the atoning blood of Christ, soon make way for hope, and peace, and joy: and the justified believer tastes a happiness, of which before he had no conception; while he expatiates in praise of his present consolations, as contrasted with his preceding anguish, in a strain not unlike the encomiums on health of one recovering from a dangerous disease. Now he would have all his fellow sinners hear of his happiness, that they may come and share it; and therefore he freely declares his own sentiments and experiences for their instruction: and his character is equally distant from that of the self-confident Pharisee, and the licentious Antinomian. Yet even this man may relax his vigilance, and fall into grievous sins, nay, be led to “keep silence,” in the same perverse and foolish manner, as he did before: so deceitful is the heart of man, and so powerful, the influence of temptation operating on human depravity!—But lengthened and multiplied miseries here, or eternal ruin hereafter, must be the inevitable consequence of this mad contest of a helpless worm against Omnipotence. Our God is indeed far more ready to forgive, than we are humbly to seek his mercy: but he will continue to frown, to rebuke, and to correct, till his children kiss the rod, confess their sins, and implore forgiveness. Then he will rejoice in pardoning and comforting them; that they may feel, and so declare to others, the difference between a humble and an unhumbled frame of mind. His “goodness” should “lead men to repentance:” but this is not the case in general; for numbers despise the riches of his mercy; and even his offending children are often kept from humble prayer, by unbelieving discouragements. But the examples of those who have found mercy again excite their hopes. Then they pray, and the Lord hears from his mercy-seat: and they will be safe from the floods of vengeance, which await those who will not “seek the LORD while he may be found.” All who come to him in this way, shall be preserved from their enemies, and rescued from their troubles; and their tears of godly sorrow shall be turned into abundant songs of joyful praise. Having tasted the bitterness of sin, and the comfort of forgiveness, they can warn and instruct their fellow sinners, and teach them by their experience: and the Lord himself will guide with his eye every humble penitent. But, with his powerful hand he will restrain, and with his “heavy hand” he will punish, the obstinate and refractory; while all the sorrows, which can be endured on earth, are as nothing, compared with the misery of the wicked in the world to come. Happy then are they, who trust in the Lord, and uprightly walk with him: mercy surrounds them, and joy is their portion; the ways, in which they are called to walk, are ways of pleasantness and peace; and the end is eternal life. “This is the heritage of the servants of the LORD, and their righteousness is of me, saith the LORD.” (Is. liv. 17.)

occasion of this Psalm is mentioned: but it is generally ascribed to David; and may perhaps be considered as a continuation of the subject, begun in the preceding Psalm; as it opens with the very same sentiment, with which that closes.—“God, and not the world, is the fountain of joy, which sinners talk of, but the righteous only possess.” Bp. He also made the human species originally of the same nature; all are derived from the same stock, and all receive that nature impaired through the fall. The hearts of men, like their faces, have the same grand outlines, which are diversified through a variety of concurring circumstances:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Rejoicing in the Lord, as our Father and Friend, is the genuine effect of humiliation and mourning for sin: for being justified by faith, and walking uprightly before him, joy is our privilege and duty. It becomes us to abound in cheerful praises; it is suited to our character, and ornamental to our profession, and honourable to God. But the joy of the hypocrite springs from presumption, and his praises are an offence and affront to the Lord.—Every endowment which we possess should be employed, with all our skill and earnestness, in the service of the Giver; and we should be avowed in our worship: but well regulated and heavenly affections are most harmonious and acceptable. (Notes, Eph. v. 15—20. Col. iii. 16, 17.)—Every part of his word is holy, just, and good, and very useful to the upright; (Note, Mic. ii. 6, 7;) and all his works are done in truth, correspond to the prophecies and promises of the Scripture, and are, in one way or other, a fulfilment of them.—Though the Lord delights in righteousness and judgment, yet the earth, which is full of man's wickedness, is filled also with his goodness: yea, his most abundant mercy consists perfectly with his most awful justice.—The formation of the earth, and the separation of the waters in the ocean, as a vast reservoir for the use of man, proclaim the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Creator: and, as they encourage the believer to expect the largest blessings from his almighty Friend, they call on all the inhabitants of the earth to stand in awe of him, and to fear his tremendous indignation. For, as “He spake, and it was done,” when the world was made; his mandate will be equally efficacious, when he shall command the destruction of his enemies: and such are all, who will not have the Saviour to reign over them. (Note, Matt. xxv. 41—46. Luke xix. 11—27.) All human power and policy are ineffectual against his omnipotent will: “his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;” and his vengeance against the ungodly will be everlasting. —But blessed are his people, who have him for their Portion, and are his chosen inheritance: who worship and serve him, live under his protection, and enjoy his favour! We possess the outward means of this blessing: may he visit our souls with salvation, and new create us unto holiness! For he who formed man’s heart, cannot be imposed upon by any appearances.—All confidence, except in his mercy, is vain. Powerful armies, personal strength and valour, or the force and speed of a horse, are unavailing for outward safety, without his protection. The event of battles, and the fate of kingdoms, are determined by his sovereign will, who considers the works of men, and acts with perfect wisdom and justice. All human devices are ineffectual for the salvation of our souls: but the Lord’s watchful eye is over those, who unite the conscientious fear of his name, with a believing hope in his mercy through the great Redeemer. He will preserve their lives, and supply their temporal wants, as far as is good for them; and he will feed their souls and preserve them from eternal death. May he teach us to say from our hearts, “Our soul waiteth for the LORD, he is our Help and Shield.” Then shall “we rejoice in him, because we have trusted in his holy name:” for “his mercy will surely be upon us, according as we hope in him.”

NOTES.

PSALM XXXIV. Title. (Note, 1 Sam. xxi. 10—15.) Achish was the name of the king of Gath; and “Abimelech,” which signifies, My father the king, seems to have been a general title given to all the kings of Philistia; as Pharaoh, and afterwards Ptolemy, was of the Egyptian kings.—This Psalm is curiously composed, according to

‘the number and order of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, in the beginning of every verse; which shews that it was contrived, when he’ (David) ‘reflected on his escape, in some place of safety.’ Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Is. xxxviii. 9—13. Jon. ii. 1, 2.)

V. 1, 2. (Notes, cxlv. 1, 2. cxlvi. 2. Phil. iv. 5—7. Col. iii. 16, 17. 1 Thes. v. 16—22. Heb. xiii. 15, 16.) While the Psalmist publicly declared the power and goodness of God, in delivering him from extreme danger, and gloried in him as his omnipotent Father and Friend; he rejoiced to think, that other pious persons in distress, would be raised above discouragement and filled with cheerful hope, by this record of his experience. The event, during almost three thousand years, has fully verified this expectation.—The word (עָנִי) rendered humble, is afterwards translated poor (6). It seems applicable either to poverty and affliction borne with meek submission; or to the lowly sense, which true believers have of their unworthiness; and the poverty in spiritual things, which renders them teachable, dependent, and thankful. (Notes, Is. lxvi. 1, 2. Matt. v. 3.)

V. 4—6. When the Psalmist understood, that he was considered, in the court of Achish, as the enemy of the Philistines who was now in their power, his fears were very great; as the method by which he sought to extricate himself clearly shews. He was however delivered; and he ascribed his escape to a peculiar interposition of God, which eventually still more encouraged his faith and hope. And he realizes to himself the effects of these events on others, who would look to God, in distress and danger, and “be lightened,” or flow unto him (marg.), and find comfort and safety, while they conversed together on the case of David: and he calls on all, to join him in extolling the name and celebrating the praises of his gracious Deliverer; as unable to do it adequately himself.

V. 7. (Note, Gen. xxiv. 2—9.) ‘Though God’s power be all-sufficient, yet for man’s infirmity, he appointeth his angels to watch over us.’ (Marg. Ref.) The singular number being here used, many think, with great probability, that Christ “the great Angel of the covenant” was intended. (Notes, Gen. xxxii. 30. xlviii. 16. Ex. iii. 2. Hos. xii. 3—6. Mal. iii. 1—4.)

is broken without his wise and merciful appointment; nay, soul and body will be preserved, and perfected for glory.

Not a bone of the Saviour was broken at his crucifixion;
though the two thieves who suffered at the same time, had their legs broken. (Notes, John xix. 31—37.)

V. 21, 22. “Desolation” means utter destruction, whether of nations as such, or of individuals. The desolation of the several kingdoms, which have persecuted the church, and that of the Jews who crucified the Saviour, “hating “that righteous One,” with the preservation ensured to true Christians, form a striking exposition of these verses.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is our duty to “bless the Lord at all times,” in pain, sickness, poverty, persecution, and even in the agonies of death. He is always worthy of our love and praise; we are always receiving more good from him than we have deserved; and the more unworthy we are, the more cause have we to adore his condescending goodness to us.—It encourages the humble believer, and silences the proud Pharisee, when the servants of God are enabled to rejoice, and make their boast in him, under circumstances of the most extreme danger, and the deepest distress: and if our faith were strong, we might thus call on all around us to magnify and exalt our God with us, extolling his glorious excellencies, and celebrating the praises of his abundant mercy.—Whilst others consider, how one poor tempted soul has been comforted and delivered, they too are encouraged to look unto the Lord; and their hearts grow cheerful, and their faith gathers strength. But we should especially look to Him, “who, though he was rich, for “our sakes became poor;” and remember how he suffered, and how he is glorified, in order to save all that trust in him.—They must be safe and happy, “who fear the “LORD.” The holy angels minister to them, yea, the great Angel of the covenant encampeth continually around them, to protect and deliver them. Oh, that sinners would but make trial of his love! Their own experience would convince them, that the blessings of salvation are sweeter than all the pleasures upon earth. But even the saints need exhortations to the reverential fear of God: the more

PSALM XXXV.

David prays that God would fight against his enemies; and anticipates their confusion, and his triumph over them, 1—10. He complains of their calumny, malice, and ingratitude; blending supplications and appeals to God, 11—22. He renews his prayers and predictions, 23—28.

humbly and obediently they walk with him, the happier
they are: and they, who “seek first the kingdom of God, “and his righteousness,” shall never want any good thing;
whilst the covetous and rapacious, who resemble ravenous beasts, shall at length be left utterly destitute. Let then all, who have themselves “tasted that the Lord is gracious,” take delight in leading others, and especially the young,
into these happy ways: by no means thinking the instruction even of little children beneath them. Let young persons set out in life with learning the fear of the Lord, if they desire true comfort here, and eternal happiness hereafter; for they are the happiest, who begin the soonest to serve so good a Master. But let them attend to him, who “speaketh unto them as unto children,” that they may learn the true fear of God, and beware of counterfeits.
That religion promises best, which begins with the conscience, and creates a watchfulness over the heart and tongue, a dread and hatred of hypocrisy and all sin, and a love of peace and universal holiness. Such a state of heart prepares the way for the proper understanding and reception of divine truth; and those who thus receive, will “adorn, the doctrine of God our Saviour.” He will peculiarly regard them and attend to their prayers: whilst he fights against the evil doer, whatever be his profession;
and oblivion or infamy will be his present and eternal portion.—Nothing is more essential to true godliness, than a contrite heart, broken off from every kind of self-confidence and self-preference, and crushed down into the dust of self-abasement: in this soil every grace flourishes; and to this contrite person nothing can give encouragement, but the free mercy of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Such characters meet with many afflictions, and are often harassed by grievous temptations, for their trial and profit; “but “the LORD will deliver them out of them all:” whilst the ungodly will sink under one trouble after another to rise no more; for “evil shall slay the wicked.”—He that accomplished the prophecies concerning the Saviour, so that “not a bone of him was broken” by all his furious enemies, will take equal care of all his faithful servants, and destroy all their persecutors. He will redeem his people from hell and from the grave, and will not forsake those who trust in him, till they possess a happiness large as their capacities, durable as their immortality, and surpassing their most sanguine expectations.

Patrick.* ‘So long as Saul was enemy to David, all that had any authority under him, to flatter their king, (as is the course of the world,) did also most cruelly persecute David.’ (Notes, 1 Sam. xxii, xxiii.)—It is likewise evident, that the Psalmist was led by the Holy Spirit, to speak of his own case in language, which was more emphatically applicable to the divine Saviour, and to his sufferings.—‘Albeit God can with his breath destroy all his enemies; yet the Holy Ghost attributeth unto him these outward weapons, to assure us of his present power.’—Draw out the spear, &c. 4—9. All the verbs, in these verses, in the original, are in the future as a prediction; though they stand in most translations and paraphrases, ancient and modern, in the imperative as an imprecation. No doubt, there are many instances, in which such denunciations stand in the form of petitions; and, considered as the language of inspired men, respecting the inveterate enemies of God, and Christ, and religion, no reasonable objection can be made against them.—It is not however desirable, to understand any passages in this sense, which more obviously express one of more general application. The verses under consideration are simply a prediction, that David’s enemies would, by their unprovoked, assiduous, and crafty devices to take away his life, bring on themselves the deepest infamy, along with unexpected and inevitable ruin; and that his trials would terminate in thanksgiving and rejoicing. (Notes, 25—28. v. 10, 11.)—As light chaff cannot resist the force of the wind, so the Psalmist’s persecutors would not be able to withstand the power and justice of God; whose angel encamped around the righteous to protect them, and would drive their dismayed and bewildered assailants headlong into the pit of destruction. (Notes, i. 4—6. xxxiv. 7. Ex. xiv. 19. 24, 25.) One in particular, (probably Saul,) would perish in that very destruction, which he had, without any cause, nay contrary to his deserts, intended for David. (Notes, 11, 12. John xv. 22—25.) He took counsel to take off David in battle against the Philistines, and he himself died in battle against them; which made way for the Psalmist’s complete deliverance. (Note, vii. 14—16.) In like manner, Ahithophel and Absalom brought ruin on themselves by their counsel against David; (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 31. xvi. 20—23. xvii. 1—14. 23. xviii. 9—14;) and so did Judas, and the Jewish rulers, and the nation, by opposing Christ; of whom David, in this psalm especially, seems to have spoken, as a type or representative. Indeed, the whole Scripture predicts the final ruin of all the impenitent enemies of God and religion, and that of Satan, their great leader: (Notes, Rev. xix. 17—21. xx. 1—3. 7—10;) and the intercession of Christ, the prayers of his church, and the ministration of angels, while they tend to complete the salvation and joy of his people, concur in accomplishing the prophecies which foretel the destruction of his enemies.—‘A traveller, benighted in a bad road, is an expressive emblem of a sinner walking in the slippery and dangerous ways of temptation;... whilst an enemy is in pursuit of him, whom he can neither resist nor avoid.’ Bp. Horne.

V. 10. The Psalmist frequently complains, under his trials and chastisements, of broken bones, and that his bones waxed old, (Marg. Ref. s.) because his whole frame was sensibly affected. In like manner he considers himself, in body as well as in soul, so revived by his deliverance, that every bone would concur in admiring his Deliverer and his unrivalled excellence.—Christ was raised from the dead, and not one of his bones was broken; every member of his mystical body shall be forthcoming at the general resurrection; and every believer now has, and shall then have, cause to praise the Lord for taking care of his soul and body, in every part, and in all respects. (Notes, xxii. 16—18. xxxiv. 19, 20.)—Saul was too powerful for David in his poor and destitute condition; Christ was made poor and a man of sorrows, and had no armed force to oppose to the power of the Jews and Romans; and Satan and other enemies are too strong for the afflicted and humble believer.

V. 11, 12. The very persons, whom David had befriended when he was in prosperity, after he had been proscribed by Saul, bare cruel witness against him, and *demand*ed that punishment should be inflicted on him for alleged acts of treason, of which he had not the least consciousness.—This was far more emphatically accomplished in the great Antitype. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13, 14. The Psalmist next contrasts his conduct in respect of his persecutors, with that towards him of the very persons to whom he had rendered the most important services.—The nature of fasting, as an occasional voluntary act of self-abasement, submission to God under adverse dispensations, sorrow for sin as the cause of sufferings, and self-discipline in order to self-government, is illustrated by the expression, “I humbled,” or afflicted, or chastened, “myself with fasting.” (Notes, Lev. xvi. 29—31. Matt. ix. 14, 15. P. O. 9—17.)—The conduct of the Psalmist’s foes shewed, as he feared, that his prayers for them had not been answered; but he was satisfied that at length they would return into his own bosom. The original is future; “shall return:” and as David was still conflicting with trials, and anticipating deliverance, the future best suits his case.—He thus mourned over the afflictions of Saul and of Israel, with fasting and prayer: and Christ wept over Jerusalem, and fasted, prayed, and suffered for sinners, as for a friend, a brother, or a parent; and he prayed for his crucifiers, when about to expire amidst their cruelty and contempt! (Notes, Matt. iv. 1, 2. Luke xix. 41—44. xxiii. 32—38.)

V. 15, 16. When David was persecuted by Saul, or when he made any false step, as they supposed, (marg.) those who had before envied him rejoiced; the most abject persons, from whom he had least expected it, or who were too obscure to be known by him, conspired to do him mischief; his name was torn with incessant reproaches and false accusations; he was their sport at feasts; whilst those, who flattered others in order to be feasted by them, or who were maintained by diverting the company, and personating and turning to ridicule the character of their neighbours, made him their constant subject; yet their contempt was united with most cruel and desperate rage.—All this was far more emphatically true of Christ, and the treatment with which he met from the hypocritical Jews, and from the most abject persons, not excepting the crucified malefactors who reviled him on the cross. (Notes, Is. liii. 2, 3. Matt. xxvi. 63—68. xxvii. 27—31. 39—44.)—The hypocritical priests, and scribes, who mocked Jesus, were at the same time keeping the feast of unleavened bread.

V. 17—19. (Notes, xxii. 7—24.) The exact agreement of the language used in these verses, with that of the passage referred to, favours the opinion that this psalm also is a direct prophecy of the Messiah. The Psalmist, however, seems evidently to have spoken of his own concerns, though carried beyond himself by the Spirit of prophecy, to use language applicable to far more important transactions.

V. 20. ‘They are men of a turbulent spirit, that give not their sovereign peaceable counsels, but devise false stories, to incense him against those that would gladly serve God quietly, under his government, without doing the least harm to any body.’ Bp. Patrick.—‘David would have lived quietly under the government of Saul: our Lord did not aim at temporal sovereignty;...nor did the primitive Christians desire to intermeddle with the politics of the world: yet all were betrayed, mocked, and persecuted, as rebels, and usurpers, and the pests of society.’ Bp. Horne.

V. 21, 22. They ‘boldly accuse me as a traitor,... saying, So, so, we have found him out; his treasonable practices are discovered, we ourselves are eye-witnesses of it.’ Bp. Patrick.—The appeal of David to God, the ever present witness of his conduct, and the prayer grounded

V. 24—28. These verses may be thus rendered “Judge me, O Lord my God, according to thy righteousness, “and let them not rejoice over me. Let them not say in “their hearts, So would we have it:” (it is as our souls desired :) “Let them not say, we have swallowed him up.— “They shall be ashamed and confounded together, who “rejoice in my shame. They shall be clothed with shame “and dishonour, that magnify themselves against me. “They will shout for joy and be glad, that favour my “righteous cause, &c.” The twenty-eighth verse is rendered in the future tense, and the two preceding verses might, with equal propriety, and perhaps with more energy, be translated in the same manner. The clamours against David, as cursing his enemies, when considered as an objection to the Scriptures, is indeed irrational; for it assumes the point in question, and determines that he spake in his own spirit, and not “as moved by the Holy Spirit;” yet it is not desirable to give needless occasion even to irrational and impious objections. (Marg. Ref.)—How applicable is the whole passage to the Saviour’s sufferings and triumphs, and to the consequences of them! (Notes, xli. 4—8. lvi. 1, 2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer is admitted into a covenant of friendship with his God: and they who strive with him, fight against his omnipotent Ally; whose presence and assistance will more effectually defend his servants, and annoy their persecutors, than the most powerful hosts of well-armed valiant men. If he say to each of our souls, “I am thy “Salvation;”—if he shew us, that our sins are pardoned and subdued, we have nothing to fear; but may confidently predict the confusion and ruin of every seducer or persecutor, who seeks to destroy our lives or souls, or in any way to do us hurt.—We must not desire the ruin of any enemies, except our lusts, and those evil spirits who would compass our destruction: yet we ought fervently and constantly to pray for the desolation of all the inveterate enemies of Christ our anointed King. Assuredly, they will at length be thrown as chaff into the fire; yea, driven in a dark and slippery path, by the angels of God into the bottomless pit: and their crafty and unwearied enmity, against the holy Jesus and his harmless followers, will involve them in unexpected and inevitable misery. Let then the persecuted and afflicted believer rejoice in the salvation of the Lord. His preservation is insured by the Saviour’s resurrection and exaltation; who will shortly “change “our vile bodies, and make them like his own glorious “body,” by his almighty power: then all our bones shall, as it were, praise our Deliverer, who hath rescued us poor and needy sinners from sin, Satan, and death; enemies far too strong for us.—While in faith we anticipate this glorious event of our trials, let us prepare for the cross in this world. When we consider the ingratitude, contempt, and hatred, with which the holy Jesus was treated, in return for his unspeakable love; when we remember how the multitudes, who had witnessed, or even shared, his benign miracles, rejoiced in his adversity; how the very abjects, collected round his cross, insulted him, and gnashed their teeth at him; and how the scribes and Pharisees treated his sacred person with blasphemous ridicule and mockery; even while they were hypocritically observing the feast of the passover, as if zealous for the honour of God and religion:—when we meditate on these scenes, we shall not “marvel if the world hate us;” if we be despised, abused, reviled, falsely accused, and treated with indignity and ingratitude, by those whom we have most loved, and could not have suspected; and who even profess to serve God. Let us then learn to possess our souls in patience and meekness; like the Saviour, let us persevere in praying for our enemies, and attempting to do them good: and acting towards them with compassion and affection, in hopes of “overcoming evil with good.” If this have not the desired effect, our prayer will bring down blessings on our own souls; and if that mind were in us which was in him, we could not but be grieved to think of the tremendous ruin, that hangs over the heads of our impenitent injurers.—He, who has exalted the once-suffering Redeemer, will in due time appear for all his people: the roaring lion shall not destroy their souls, which they have entrusted to the hands of their Surety; they are one with him, and precious in his sight, and shall be rescued from every peril and destruction; that with him they may give thanks in the great congregation above. Let us then give ourselves unto prayer, and study to be quiet in the land, however injured or deceived. Thus our enemies shall never triumph in our destruction; and their rejoicing over our temporal calamities shall be short-lived, as was that of the Jewish rulers over the crucified Redeemer.—But let us chiefly fear lest they should rejoice at beholding us betrayed into sin, and disgracing our profession. This would please them more, than seeing us cast into a fiery furnace;

and they would exclaim, "Aha, aha, our eye hath seen it,
"so would we have it!" Then indeed those, who hate us without cause, would wink with their eyes, encouraging each other's blasphemies; and open wide their mouths to proclaim our infamy, to the reproach of our religion. This the Lord knows, and as his glory is concerned, let us call upon him, intreating him not to be far from us; but constantly to uphold us, that Satan and his servants may not thus magnify themselves against us. In all things let us act conscientiously, and leave our cause with God. And whilst we expect to see the opposers of Christ "clothed "with shame and dishonour;" let us pray that all who favour his righteous cause may rejoice, and be continually praising God: and let us remember, that he has pleasure in the prosperity of all his servants; that we may be speaking of his righteousness and praise all the day long.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXVI. V. 1. David was as much convinced by the conduct of wicked men, that they were not habitually possessed by the fear of God, as if it had been immediately spoken to his heart: and his knowledge of the de-ceitfulness and evil of his own heart aided him in discovering the source of other men's wickedness. If the terrors of God for a moment affrighted them, they soon cast them behind their backs, or they could not have gone on in their daring crimes. (Notes, cxii. 1. 7. Neh. v. 14—18. Prov. xvi. 6. Ec. xii. 11—14. Rom. iii. 9—18.)—It is probable, that Saul was especially meant, as the wicked man who persecuted "David, the servant of the LORD," with persevering enmity: yet he frequently cloaked his malice with professions of friendship, and still kept up an outward regard to religion. The psalm seems to have been written, soon after Saul began to shew his hatred to David.

V. 2. The wicked man not only disguises his crimes or intentions from others; but, through the excess of self-love, he becomes his own flatterer, calls his vices by soft names, or mistakes them for virtues; and deems his conduct justifiable, perhaps meritorious, when in fact it is a hateful compound of impiety, injustice, and malevolence, and will very soon be proved to be so.—Thus Saul's self-flattery kept him from being aware of the malignity of his conduct, till he became odious in the open view of mankind. (Notes, 1 Sam. xv. 13—28. xxii. 6—19. 1 Chr. x. 13,

V. 3, 4. Saul, in the beginning of his reign, behaved wisely, and performed good services to his people: but he soon began to act foolishly, and to disobey God; and at length he entirely ceased to use his understanding to do good. (Notes, 1 Sam. xi. xxviii. 3—10.) He became a treacherous and cruel persecutor of David: and while he perhaps ascribed his conduct in throwing his javelin at him, to a sudden paroxysm of disease; David was aware that he most deliberately, and in his retired hours, plotted his destruction; and had no aversion in his heart to any wickedness, however abominable, though he tried to cloke
his malice by plausible professions. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—9. The Psalmist here contrasted the divine per-fections and government, with the conduct of wicked men, especially when in power. The mercy of God is immensely large; and, having filled the earth with its effects, it fills the heavens also, by the admission of redeemed sinners to that blessed state. His faithfulness reaches unto, and even far above, the clouds or skies, and is liable to no mutability or failure. His justice is placed on an immovable basis, and he never varies from it: yet his judgments, or decrees, are unfathomably deep, to be adored, but not comprehended by us. (Notes, lvii. 7—11. lxxi. 19. lxxvii.

PSALM XXXVII.

Miscellaneous cautions against envy, anger, and discontent; descriptions of the characters, situations, and end of the righteous and the wicked; exhortabeast; and his immeasurable loving-kindness, in its varied exercises, encourages even the guilty and polluted sons of Adam to trust in his mercy, and to confide in his protection. (Marg. Ref. q.—Note, Ruth ii. 11, 12.) In this refuge, and in his service, believers find abundant consolation, and drink “pleasures as from a river,” flowing from the Fountain of life and felicity: and in the knowledge and favour of God, they see light and glory inexpressible. (Notes, xlv. 4. Rev. vii. 13—17. xxi. 22—27. xxii. 1—5.)—The word rendered pleasures, (8, עֲנָנִים,) is the plural of Eden.—‘In heaven alone the thirst of an immortal soul after happiness can be satisfied. There the streams of Eden will flow again.’ Bp. Horne.

V. 10, 11. David was conscious of integrity, and had been favoured with much experience of the Lord’s faithful and merciful care; but his dangers and troubles were multiplied, and all who knew God and uprightly served him, were in a measure involved in his difficulties. (Note, 1 Chr. xxviii. 9.) He therefore prayed, that the favour shewn to him and them might be prolonged according to the faithful promises of God; and that he would judge in righteousness, between his persecuted servants and their unrighteous persecutors: that so “the foot of pride might not come against him, and the hand of the wicked might not cast him down;” but that he might be preserved from the scornful oppression, and iniquitous power, of every enemy. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. ‘Faith calleth things that are not, as though they were; it carries us forward to the end of time; it shews us the Lord sitting on the throne of judgment, the righteous caught up to meet him in the air; the world in flames under his feet; and the empire of sin fallen, to rise no more.’ Bp. Horne.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

To be “the servant of the Lord” is the highest privilege and honour, to which we can aspire; and those who are advanced to eminent stations in society should glory to fill them up, as serving God and his church in them.—All the wickedness of men springs from contempt and forgetfulness of God: their actions speak more plainly than their words; and when they commit atrocious crimes without remorse, or habitually live in the practice of any sin, we may be sure, “that there is no fear of God before their eyes;” and that they habitually despise his favour, and defy his wrath. But proud and ignorant men deceive themselves, and verily think their conduct excusable, when it is indeed most hateful: let us then daily beg of God to preserve us from self-flattery, and to bring us acquainted with our own character, that we may judge and condemn ourselves, and not finally be condemned at his tribunal.—

When such as have appeared to be religious leave off to behave wisely and to do good, they will soon be drawn into grosser crimes; and the deceitful and corrupt language of their lips will betray the desperate wickedness of their hearts.—If we willingly banish holy meditations, in our solitary hours, nay, if we do not encourage them, Satan will soon occupy our minds with polluting and mischievous imaginations: and if any yield frequently to sudden temptations, they will at length deliberately “devise mischief upon their beds.”—Whatever be a man’s outward conduct, if he do not “abhor evil,” he is no true penitent: and if he do not set himself heartily to walk in the ways of godliness, he will soon return into the more direct road to temporal and eternal destruction.—The servants of God must expect much trouble from apostates and wicked men; but they may comfort themselves by contemplating the perfections of their almighty Friend. His merciful promises engage to every believer the enjoyment of heavenly happiness; his unfailing faithfulness guarantees the engagement; his immovable justice harmonizes with his truth and love; and his most mysterious appointments are the result of his infinite wisdom and goodness. Whilst all his creatures share his bounty and protection; his compassion and mercy, and the provisions of his redeeming love, are so immense, and of such inestimable value, that the chief of sinners may come to him, and receive pardon and peace, and put their trust under the shadow of his wings. Thither the alarmed and penitent flee for safety, perhaps imagining that they are thus renouncing all enjoyment in this present world: but they soon find, if decided and diligent, true happiness in the favour and service of God: the provisions of his house are rich and plenteous; and the consolations of his Spirit, communicated through his ordinances, are an earnest of heavenly joys. This “river of the water of life” proceedeth from the throne of God and of the Lamb; and they must be happy, who have access to “the Fountain of life.” (Notes, Rev. xxi. 5—8. xxii. 1.) Indeed God is the Source of felicity; but fallen man has forsaken him and is miserable. In Christ, however, this Fountain is accessible; “wells of salvation” are opened for us by the gospel; and sinners, returning to God according to it, see and enjoy light and felicity, in their Source and Perfection. (Note, Is. xii. 3.)—May we then know, and love, and uprightly serve the Lord! Then shall we be interested in the prayers of all his people, and learn to love and pray for them: and his loving kindness will be continued to us through the intercession of our heavenly Advocate. Then shall no proud enemy, on earth or from hell, come against us to trample upon us, or to separate us from his love; but we shall be established in felicity, when all the workers of iniquity are cast down to rise no more for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXVII. V. 1, 2. It is probable, that this psalm was written towards the close of David's life, as the result of his long experience and observation, for the instruction and encouragement of others, who might be called to pass through such trying scenes, as he had been conversant with.—Every other verse, in the original, begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, nearly in regular order: and this arrangement, which, with some variations, is frequently adopted, might be intended as a help to those, who desired to commit to memory these sacred poems, for their comfort and benefit in silence and solitude.—The Mosaic dispensation engaged peculiar temporal blessings to the nation of Israel, while they were obedient: yet individuals frequently prospered in wickedness, while the righteous were afflicted and persecuted. (Notes, Ps. lxxiii. 1—17.) This seemed to imply an inconsistency between the word and the providence of God, and formed a great trial to ancient believers. To this difficulty the Psalmist here gives a copious solution, with many excellent cautions and counsels, which at the same time are equally suited, by varying a few expressions, to the case of Christians in this evil world. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lxxiii. 18—22. Prov. xxiii. 17, 18. xxiv. 19, 20.)

V. 3. This verse may be rendered: "Trust in the LORD, and do good; dwell in the land; and feed thou verily," or in confidence. All the verbs are imperative.—The union between entire dependence on God, and doing good, as the way to be comfortable and happy, is peculiarly to be noticed. The land of Canaan was considered as the sum of earthly, and the type of heavenly felicity. to be provided for in the Lord's land, and there to dwell under his protection, near his ordinances, and among his people, was all that the genuine Israelite could desire. But the words may be considered as an exhortation to the people to dwell in the land, and not to remove on every difficulty among the surrounding Gentiles; with a promise that verily God would feed them there. (Notes, Ruth i. 1—10.)

V. 4. To "delight," not in earthly possessions, pleasures, and distinctions, but in God; in knowing, loving, and worshipping him and enjoying his love, and in contemplation, devotion, and admiring praise; is to be spiritually-minded, like the inhabitants of heaven, and qualified for their felicity.—He that seeks delight in worldly objects very seldom obtains the wishes of his heart; but the largest and most earnest desires and requests of those who delight in God will be granted, nay, far exceeded. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. lviii. 13, 14. Hab. iii. 17—19. Rom. v. 11. viii. 5—9. Phil. iv. 4. Col. iii. 1—4. 1 Pet. i. 8, 9.)

V. 5—8. "When thou hast any difficult business in hand, . . . or when thou knowest not what course to take, for accomplishing of thy honest designs; leave all to the LORD, and trust to him, in pious and upright courses, that he will direct and assist thee, and bring things to a good issue." Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Prov. iii. 5, 6. Phil. iv. 5—7.) The original is "Roll thy way, &c." (Marg.—Notes, lv. 22. Prov. xvi. 3. marg. 1 Pet. v. 5—7.) The Septuagint render it "Reveal thy way, &c.;" which is very expressive of the relief which the believer, when burdened with trouble and anxiety, obtains by opening his case, and pouring out his soul, before God in fervent prayers. (Notes, 1 Sam. i. 9—16.) This may especially be hoped for under unmerited calumnies, which for a while darken the reputation, as mists and clouds obscure the sun; but God will in due time clear up the character of the upright, and make it as bright as the noon-day. (Notes, Is. liv. 15—17. Mic. vii. 8—10. Rom. viii. 32—34.) Silent waiting on God, in patience and confidence, is therefore recommended; without giving way either to that uneasiness and agitation, which are generally felt, when the ungodly for a while prosper, and run down the conscientious; or to eagerness in self-vindication: and especially a caution is given against anger and bitterness, and an imitation of the violent tempers and unjust measures of those who are the objects of indignation and of envy. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. (Note, xxxvi. 12.)—The earth.] Or "the land." He has all that the earth itself can supply, who has food and raiment, and things suited to his station, with peace, contentment, and a thankful heart. (Notes, 10, 11. 21, 22. Matt. v. 5.)

V. 12—15. The holiness and happiness of the righteous, and the special favour which God shews them, excite the enmity and envy of the wicked. Thus Cain hated, and envied, and murdered Abel; (Notes, Gen. iv. 1—12;) thus Saul, from a similar spirit, plotted against David, and gnashed on him with his teeth; and thus the Jewish rulers persecuted the holy Jesus and his disciples. (Note, xxxv. 15, 16.) For a while they seem to prosper; but the Lord despises their impotent malice, and foresees the day, when they will suffer the just punishment of their crimes; would soon be reduced, by the secret curse of God on his affairs, to borrow; and be disabled from paying, as well as careless about it: but the righteous would be rendered able to gratify his inclination in acts of liberal mercy, through the divine blessing, and the promise which secured to him the inheritance of the land.—This more especially referred to the Israelites in Canaan; yet the same blessing and curse, even in temporal things, are still often experienced and observed. (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 3—14. 43, 44. Prov. xxii. 7.)

V. 23, 24. Our translators here insert the word good; and no doubt the pious man, the true believer, is exclusively meant.—God directs, counsels, and supports his steps; and he delights in his holy conversation, and the fruits of his own Spirit, which are through Christ well pleasing to him. (Notes, cxlvii. 10, 11. 1 Sam. ii. 9. Jer. ix. 23, 24. Zeph. iii. 14—20. Phil. iv. 14—20. Heb. xiii. 15, 16.)—A good man may fall through temptation, as David had done in a most deplorable manner: but he shall not be cast down to rise no more, as hypocrites are, or be a castaway, one finally rejected by God; because God himself upholds him by his mighty power. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25, 26. There is not indeed an absolute promise in scripture that no righteous man shall ever want bread, or his seed become beggars: but the Psalmist had never, during a long course of observation, known an instance of the kind. It is, no doubt, a very rare case in any age, but was peculiarly so under the Mosaic dispensation.—Yet times of persecution seem excepted from general rules concerning temporal things, having so many particular promises relating to them: and we cannot tell how it may please our wise and righteous God for our good, to try our faith and patience, or to remove us out of this world; or how he may see good to dispose of our posterity. But in general the godly man will best secure himself and his children from want: and that genuine liberality to the poor, in giving or lending, according as circumstances may require, which men think will impoverish their families, is in fact by far the best way of laying up a provision for them. (Notes, cxii. 5—10. Prov. xi. 24—26. xiii. 22, 23. xix. 17. Ec. xi. 1—6.)

V. 27, 28. This general counsel for present and future happiness is here again inculcated, (Note, xxxiv. 11—14,) in a manner which shews, that none but the saints, the regenerate and believing who have obtained mercy, do thus “depart from evil and do good:” and the final preservation of the saints is most expressly maintained, and grounded on the Lord’s love of judgment, and faithfulness to his promises.—Some think this doctrine is to be found nowhere, except in St. Paul’s epistles; and then they endeavour to explain away his language: but not one sentence in his writings is more explicit, than this declaration of the inspired Psalmist. (Note, 1 Pet. i. 3—5.)

V. 29—31. (Notes, 9—11.)—“The righteous man, “whose mouth speaketh wisdom, whose tongue talketh of “judgment, and in whose heart is the law of his God, “shall not slide in any of his steps.” Thus some render these verses, which strongly mark the character of those saints, “who are preserved for ever.” (Notes. xl. 6—8. Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. Rom. vii. 22—25.)—Wise and pious conversation, when it comes from the abundance of the heart, and is enforced by a holy example, is one grand means of communicating the savour of divine truth around, in families and neighbourhoods, and of transmitting it to posterity. (Notes, lxxi. 13—15. 22—24. Prov. x. 20, 21. xv. 7. xxv. 11, 12. Matt. xii. 33—37. Jam. iii. 3—12. P. O. 1—12.)

V. 32, 33. In general, God will defend his servants against the designs of wicked men, when, under colour of law, they seek to murder them by a judicial process: and in those cases in which he, for wise reasons, allows persecutors to prosper; he will finally rescue the persecuted from their malice, and openly reverse their unrighteous decisions.—The wicked one, “the accuser of the brethren,” will in like manner be baffled and silenced. (Notes, 5—8. 12—15. Rom. viii. 32—39.)

V. 34. “The apostle, writing to the Hebrew converts, “under affliction and persecution, thus expresseth the sen-

V. 35, 36. The text of our translation gives, as the emblem of a wicked man’s prosperity, an ever-green, flourishing and beautiful to look upon, but bearing no fruit, or only such as is poisonous. But most expositors suppose that a tree, growing in its native soil and never transplanted, is meant: and in these circumstances, trees acquire their largest and most luxuriant growth. (Marg.)—Thus Saul, Doeg, and Ahithophel, in David’s time, had flourished; and thus they had vanished.—The vision of Nebuchadnezzar, and Daniel’s interpretation, form a striking illustration of these verses. (Notes, Dan. iv. 1—33.) ‘I looked about me to see what was become of him, and whether he might not be removed (as a tree sometimes is,) to another place, but there was no such man . . . to be found.’ Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Job v. 3—5. xviii. 5—21.)

V. 37, 38. He that patiently and accurately observes the dealings of God with his upright, consistent, and faithful servants, will find, that whatever trials, temptations, and disquietudes they have during a great part of their lives, their closing scene is tranquil and comfortable; and that there are very few exceptions to this general rule. But a contrary and dreadful end, sooner or later, awaits all the ungodly. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 39, 40. Marg. Ref.—Notes, Eph. ii. 4—10. 2 Tim. iv. 16—18. Tit. ii. 11—14.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is of vast importance to understand the present and future condition of the righteous and the wicked, that we may know what to choose and to expect. The workers of iniquity, who cast off the fear of God, to follow their own corrupt inclinations; and who are fraudulent, covetous, sensual, or profane; who “plot against the righteous, gnashing upon them with their teeth,” and using their power and subtlety to oppress, ruin, and murder the poor: even such monsters of wickedness often prosper for a time, succeed in their projects, flourish in wealth, pomp, and mirth, and seem to enjoy happiness. (Note, Job xxi. 7—16.) But their flourishing resembles that of the grass, and they will be soon cut down and withered: shortly they will be no more found on earth; into heaven they cannot enter; hell alone remains for them, where they will for ever be sacrifices to the righteous vengeance of their offended God. Then their power of doing mischief will be at an end, and their injurious swords will pierce their own souls, with inexpressible anguish. As they are now under the wrath and curse of the Almighty, their plenty and prosperity only pamper them for destruction; and the wealth which they leave behind them proves a snare, and often a curse, to their posterity; while terrors of conscience, dread of death, and furious passions, mar their precarious enjoyments, and give them a sad foretaste of the wrath to come. Who that believes these things, can envy them, or fret themselves at beholding their success and magnificence; while, like the heathen sacrifices, they are led to the slaughter, adorned with gaudy ribbands, and accompanied with the viol, the song, and the dance?—But the righteous bear another character, meet with other treatment, have other supports, and will experience a contrary end. They “trust in the LORD,” walk in his ordinances and commandments, and imitate him who went about doing good to the bodies and souls of men. They delight in the favour and service of God, and expect their happiness from him; the leading desires of their hearts are after communion with him, and conformity to him, and to be instrumental to his glory; they follow after meekness, humility, and a blameless conversation; they are upright and sincere; and though often poor and needy, they spare from other expences a portion, to lend and give, as occasion requires. Their mouth will be speaking of wisdom, and their tongue will be talking of judgment: and this springs from the abundance of the heart, in which the law of God is written; and comports with the actions of their lives which are ordered in his ways. Their salvation is from the Lord, and reigns within; and it appears that they are accepted through the merits of Christ, because they are partakers of his Spirit, and bring forth “the fruits of the Spirit.”—Yet must such Christians expect tribulation in the world. They are not exempted from the common afflictions of life, or pampered with worldly prosperity; their heavenly Father does not withhold from them salutary correction; the world hates and despises them; calumnies, reproaches, and persecutions are their usual portion: while some have been constrained to wander in dens and caves, others (“of whom the world was not worthy,”) have been immured in prisons, and tortured to death. In general they are a poor and afflicted people, and Satan distresses, as much as he can, those whom he is not able to deceive, defile, or destroy: their endeavours to do good are often unsuccessful, and ingratitude proves their only recompence. They therefore have need of faith and pa-

PSALM XXXVIII.

The Psalmist deprecates the wrath of God, and describes the sufferings to which his sins had exposed him, 1—10. He complains that his friends deserted him, while persecuted by his foes, 11, 12. He resigns himself to God, and hopes in him; while he confesses his sins, shews the character of his enemies, and pleads for deliverance, 13—22.

O LORD, ^b rebuke me not in thy wrath;

tience, of hope and love: but, observing the directions and pleading the promises of God, they find inward comfort to counterbalance their outward trials. He will maintain their lot, and supply their wants: whatever they lose for conscience' sake, "verily they shall be fed:" and food and raiment here, with heaven at last, is a goodly portion.—The Lord will also vindicate their characters, and give them peace of conscience: when he sees good, their enemies shall be at peace with them; and they shall enjoy more content, than if they actually inherited the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace: for their little shall be better, than the riches of many wicked. The Lord himself will uphold and protect them: he knows their days and will proportion their strength and comfort, and in no evil time shall they be ashamed of their confidence; for "they are the blessed of the LORD, and their "children with them." He orders their steps and delights in their way; if they fall under temptation, they shall not be utterly cast down; if into trouble, he will not leave them to sink under it. Their work of faith, and labour and liberality of love, instead of impoverishing them, shall lay up an inheritance for their children; and few accurate observers of mankind have known the consistent believer, or his children, reduced to abject, friendless penury. In short, the Lord, having separated his people from the world, and taught them to love righteousness and judgment, will preserve them for ever; and however they may be slandered, tempted, or persecuted by the way, their end shall be serene and happy: they shall have hope in their death, and be better spoken of afterwards, than during their lives; and while they enjoy their everlasting inheritance, they will witness the destruction of all impenitent transgressors. Even in this world it is evident, that the afflicted righteous man is far happier than the most prosperous of the wicked.—Let sinners then be counselled to "depart from evil, and to do good;" to repent, and forsake sin, to trust in the mercy of God through Jesus Christ, and take his yoke upon them, and learn of him, that they may dwell for evermore in heaven. Let us all watch against impatience, envy, and despondency, and look more to the wretched end of wicked men, than to their present state; committing all we are, and have, and do, to the Lord's disposal, being assured that he will order that which is best for us. Let us cease from wrath and contention, which are sure inlets to evil doing; and wait for and on the Lord, and keep his way, without wearying or turning aside: let us endeavour to give energy to edifying conversation, by holy living: let us mark the closing

NOTES.

PSALM XXXVIII. Title. Either the Psalmist, under his affliction, composed this psalm to assist him in recollecting his sins, or in calling upon God to remember his distress; or he desired to remember as long as he lived, and wished to remind others, how he had suffered for his sins, and what his sentiments and sensations had been whilst enduring correction.—It is the third of those which are called penitential psalms; and describes among the Psalmist's other trials some grievous diseases, with which he was visited for his sins; or, as some think, his inward trials were represented by language, taken from enfeebling and loathsome sickness. It is probable, that the calamities which befell David, after his sin in respect of Bathsheba and Uriah, gave occasion to the doleful complaints contained in it. (Notes, vi. xxxii.)

V. 1, 2. Arrows. (2) Acute pains, anguish of spirit, and sharp sufferings of any kind, are spoken of under the figure of barbed arrows, which fasten and rankle in the flesh, and cannot be extracted without the most exquisite torture. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. Soundness. Some understand this clause to mean, that disease had so altered the Psalmist, as scarcely to leave him the form or appearance of a human being. (Notes, xxx. 2. xli. 4—8. Job ii. 7, 8. xix. 5—22. xxx. 15—19. Is. i. 5, 6.) Whatever allusion may be made, in this passage, either to the depravity of human nature, or to the prevalence of sin, or to the anguish of the soul under a sense of divine wrath; it seems evident, that the writer was visited with some dire malady, which affected his whole frame in the most distressing manner; and that he considered this as the chastisement of God, for some particular sins of which his conscience accused him.

V. 4. David's iniquities, like the numberless drops of rain, which form a deluge, had been so multiplied, that they overwhelmed him; as waters which rise above a man's head, so that he can no longer stand against or escape them. And as he felt, that the temporal consequences of his crimes were so distressing, and oppressed him beyond endurance: so he seems to have been con-

Christ sustained, when “the LORD caused to meet on

V. 11, 12. Cowardice, pride, and selfishness, caused David’s friends and acquaintance to keep at a distance, during his afflictions; lest they should share his disgrace and danger, or be put to expense or inconvenience: but his enemies were emboldened in forming plans to accomplish his destruction.—These particulars were still more emphatically verified, in the sufferings of the Son of David.

V. 13, 14. David, in the patience and meekness, with which he endured his complicated sufferings, was a type of him, who, “when he was reviled, reviled not again:”
but David’s troubles were the chastisement, and part of them seem to have been the consequences, of his transgressions; whereas Christ suffered for our sins, and ours alone. (Notes, Is. liii. 4—7. Matt. xxvii. 11—18. 1 Pet. ii.
18—25.)

V. 15. The translation of the last clause of this verse, in the book of common prayer, contains an important instruction: “Thou shalt answer for me, O Lord, my “God.” (Marg.) Thus Christ was silent before his false accusers and unjust judges, and “committed himself to “Him that judgeth righteously.”

V. 16—18. It was evident, that the enemies of David were ungodly men, who would rejoice in his falls and calamities, from dislike, not to his sins, but to his religion:
the honour of God was therefore concerned to confound and silence them; and consequently to uphold his servant, notwithstanding that he was conscious of his weakness and unworthiness. (Notes, xlii. 1—4. xxxv. 15, 16. Jer. xx.
10—13.) This consciousness and fear of the consequences, not only to himself, but especially to the cause of true religion, presented a most gloomy prospect before his eyes:
except as he trusted in God to keep him from falling, for the honour of his own name; and as he ingenuously confessed his past sins, and was grieved and distressed on account of them. (Notes, xxxii. 3—5. li. 3, 4. 2 Cor. vii.

basely used, by men, not for the sins into which he had fallen in particular instances, but for the general tenour of a holy and useful life; are strongly marked in this passage. This shews, that the most decided rejoicing in the testimony of a man's conscience, respecting his conduct towards men, in those things of which he has been unjustly condemned, is perfectly consistent with the deepest humiliation as a sinner in the sight of God. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Under the temporal effects of the Lord's abhorrence of sin, and the anguish of his correcting rod, the believer is most troubled with the apprehension of his vindictive wrath, and lest he should share the doom of the ungodly; and he can bear any thing when assured that this shall never be his case. Yet God often sees good, in order to warn others, to silence the reproaches of scoffers, to vindicate the honour of religion, and for his own glory, to make the afflictions of his offending children very sharp, complicated, and permanent; and to extort from them many doleful groans and lamentations. In such circumstances, when the correction begins to produce its salutary effects, they readily trace their sorrows to the fatherly displeasure of the Lord, whose "arrows stick fast in them," and whose hand presseth them sore; and they humbly acknowledge their sins to be the cause of his anger. Their own iniquities form that deluge which goes over their heads; and their sense of guilt is the heaviest burden which is laid upon them: "it is indeed too heavy for them to bear;" and would sink them into despair and ruin, unless removed by the pardoning mercy of God. The prevalence of sin, and the successful force of temptations, form their worst diseases, and their most offensive and dangerous wounds: and while "there is no soundness in their flesh," and no rest in their bones, they are led to consider their sculs, in which 'there is no health.' For pride, covetousness, envy, malice, and lust, are diseases of the soul of far greater malignity than fevers, dropsies, palsies, gout, or stone, are of the body: yet numbers feel not their sickness, till it be too late to apply the remedy. But, when we perceive our true condition, the good Physician is valued, resorted to, and obeyed: (Note, Matt. ix. 10—13:) though even they, who are in this sure way of an effectual cure, often retard it, and experience grievous relapses, through their foolishness; and their wounds rankle and corrupt, because they delay to go to their merciful Friend, and to apply the healing balm which he has prepared. Would we not prolong our own miseries, when we are conscious of having offended, we should immediately approach the mercy-seat with penitent confessions and believing prayers; that without delay our sins may be pardoned, our strength renewed, and our enemy prevented from rejoicing over us. Yet the feeling and effects of the

PSALM XXXIX.

David purposes not to offend with his tongue; and describes his inward commotion, 1—3. His prayers, and meditations on the shortness of life, and the vanity divine displeasure must needs trouble him who loves God, and "bow him down greatly and make him to go mourning all the day long;" and even enfeeble him, and cause him to "roar for the very disquietness of his heart:" for "a wounded spirit who can bear?" (Note, Prov. xviii. 14:) and this uneasiness will be in proportion to the degree in which he values the favour of God, and delights in communion with him. But, while the hypocrite takes encouragement from David's sins to transgress, he is a perfect stranger to David's ingenuous anguish of spirit under the consciousness of his guilt.—In the true believer's case, however, all this trouble will be useful: he will wait for and on his God, and not seek relief from the world, or from himself: he will bring his whole desire before his heavenly Father, and be encouraged, because "his groaning is not hid from him;" even though, like one expiring, "his heart panteth, his strength faileth, and the sight of his eyes is gone from him," and he knows not what to say or do. Nay, should all this be attended with the unkindness and inconstancy of lovers, friends, and relatives, who stand aloof from his affliction; while treacherous and cruel foes are "laying snares for his life and seeking his hurt, and speaking mischievous things, and imagining deceits all the day long;" still that consciousness of guilt which forms his heaviest load, will keep down indignation, silence murmurs and reproaches, and produce meek and quiet submission. For if the holy Jesus bore all this, without a complaint or a reproof; what reason can a humble sinner think he has to yield to impatience or anger, when mercifully corrected for his sins, whatever rod the Lord is pleased to employ? He will therefore be as one deaf and dumb, respecting the calumnies and scoffs of the wicked, when he feels himself to be under the divine rebuke for his sins; (Note, Ez. xvi. 60—63;) he will "commit himself unto him that judgeth righteously;" and be thankful that he may yet hope, and pray to him with the prospect of being heard and helped.—When the wicked are ready to rejoice at our calamities, or to magnify themselves against us; when our feet slip; when we feel ourselves feeble, and ready to halt or stumble, and are grieved continually, that we have given them, or lest we should give them, cause to triumph over us; we have good arguments to urge in prayer, why the Lord should help and uphold us. Let us then declare before him our iniquity, and be sorry for our sins; and seek earnestly the destruction of our inward foes, which are so lively and so strong. And if, notwithstanding our offences against God, our enemies hate us, not for our sins, but because we follow the thing that is good; let us not be discouraged by their wrongful and ungrateful enmity; seeing we are in this conformed to our Saviour: but after his example, let us still persevere in endeavouring to "overcome evil with good." (Note, Rom. xii. 17—21.) Let us also continue in prayer, that the Lord may pardon and subdue our iniquities: then will he never forsake us, or be far from us; for he will surely hasten to the help of all those, who trust in him as their Salvation.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXIX. V. 1—4. It is thought, that David wrote this psalm during Absalom's rebellion: and it is evident that the writer's mind was greatly discomposed, by injuries and temptations, when he began his meditation. He however resolved to practise the rules which he gave to others; (Notes, xxxvii. 1—9;) and not only to walk with peculiar circumspection, but especially to watch over his words, and stop his mouth, as the mouths of animals are confined by a muzzle: for so the word signifies. (Marg.) Aware of the baseness of his enemies, he determined on a total silence before them: he would neither speak any thing in his own vindication, nor complain of them; nor utter any pious discourse, which would have been like throwing pearls before swine. Yet the treatment which he received, his indignation at the crimes which he witnessed, his zeal for the honour of God, and the restraint imposed on him, excited in his mind a vehement and painful commotion; and the thoughts, which wrought within, proved like the blowing of embers, which produces an intense heat, and bursts forth into a flame. (Notes, Jer. xx. 7—9. Ez. iii. 22—27.) He did not indeed break his resolution by speaking before the wicked: but with vehemence, and some tincture of impatience, he prayed to the Lord, that he might know his end, and the measure and limits of his days, and now near he was to the closing scene; that, being suitably affected with the shortness of life, and his own frailty, he might be the more engaged to prepare for death and eternity, and less concerned about all his temporal interests. (Notes, xc. 7—12. 1 Cor. vii. 29—31. Jam. iv. 13—17. 1 Pet. iv. 7.) David, in his entire silence, resembled Christ when he answered nothing before Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 63—68. xxvii. 11—18. Luke xxiii. 6—12. John xix. 8—12.)

V. 5. At his best state.] Or, “when settled” or established most firmly. (Marg.)—Some things decay after a certain time, but generally last that time; others endure long, if free from accidents, yet are easily broken: but the life of man not only wears out speedily as a garment, but it is also brittle like glass. (Notes, xc. 3—6. ciii. 15—18. Job xiv. 1—6. Ec. i. 2.)

V. 6. A vain shew.] Or shadow, unsubstantial and vanishing; or an image. (Marg.—Notes, lxxiii. 18—22.) Such are all the interests, pursuits, and distinctions of this world; about which men are constantly disquieting themselves and others, till death stops their career, and they leave their acquisitions without knowing who will at length possess them, and remove to a state of important and eternal realities. (Notes, xlix. 6—20. Esth. v. 11—14. viii. 1, 2, Prov. xiii. 22. Luke xii. 15—21. xvi. 27—31.)

V. 7, 8. Meditation on the vanity of all outward things, led the Psalmist to fix more entirely his expectation on God alone, as the Fountain of happiness: but recollecting his heinous transgressions, and his proneness to sin, he earnestly prayed for deliverance from guilt and depravity; and that he might not, by subsequent misconduct, disgrace the cause of God, and expose himself to the reproach of any foolish and wicked man. The original is Nabal. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Sam. xxv. 10—17. 23—31. v. 25.)

V. 9, 10. “I was dumb, I will not open my mouth,” &c. The consideration, that his afflictions were appointed by his heavenly Father, silenced the Psalmist's complaints; (Notes, xxxviii. 13, 14. Lev. x. 3. 1 Sam. iii. 16—18. 2 Kings xx. 19. Job i. 20—22;) yet he pleaded for a mitigation of them, because he was ready to sink under them. Thus Christ, when entering on the last scene of his unknown sufferings, prayed, “Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt.” (Note, Matt. xxvi. 36—39.)

as a powerful monarch and a renowned conqueror, over the people of Israel, now fully settled in their promised inheritance. When, however, he considered the shortness and vanity of life, and looked forward to a future and permanent state; he too owned, that he was a stranger and pilgrim on earth, even as they also had been. (Notes, cxix.

V. 13. If this psalm was composed during Absalom's usurpation, David might mean, that he was desirous before he left the world, to recover his peace of mind, to be reinstated in his authority, and to retrieve his character. He however prayed, that his faith, hope, and love, might recover strength; that he might be enabled to do some further service to his people, before his death; and have inward comfort, when about to depart hence and be no more seen. His prayer in all these respects was completely answered. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxix.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The presence of the wicked, especially if powerful and prosperous, exposes us to many temptations, either by enticing or terrifying us into improper compliances, or by exciting our indignation or envy. When we are not able wholly to separate from them, we should double our watchfulness, and especially impose a strict restraint upon our tongues; lest we should be betrayed into boasting, revil-ing, slander, flattery, or trifling conversation: remembering that they will criticise every expression, and turn it, if they can, to our disadvantage, and to the discredit of religion. Sometimes it may be necessary to keep silence even from good words, when they are likely to excite profane contempt or rage; yet in general we run into an extreme, when we are backward to engage in edifying discourse. (Note, Jam. i. 26.) But even if we be enabled to bridle our tongues, we shall often find ourselves incapable of repressing our passions. When zeal, anger, impatience, compassion, grief, and other conflicting affections, are excited in the heart, confinement increases their force, and reflection excites more disquietude, till a fire seems to be kindled within, which must in some way break forth. In this case, it is our wisdom to retire, and pour out our hearts before God, and to utter our complaints, sorrows, and desires to him alone. It is also very composing to the believer's mind, under sore trials and temptations, to know and consider his end, and the measure of his days: but we are never suitably affected with such subjects, except we pray over them, and are inwardly taught by the Spirit of God. It would be in vain for us to enquire the precise time which we have to live; nor would the information, could it be had, be desirable: (Note, 2 Kings xx. 6:) it will answer every good purpose attentively to consider the shortness and uncertainty of life. Our days are but a hand-breadth, or as nothing, before God, and in comparison of his eternity: and in our greatest prosperity, and in the vigour of youth and health, verily every man is altogether vanity. He cannot live long; he may die soon, and suddenly; his busy cares are useless, his acquisitions are a shadow; he is disquieted in vain; and if he succeed in heaping up riches, he must shortly leave them, not knowing who shall gather them. How absurd then are the perplexing anxieties, and the incessant fatigues, of the most successful worldling, who pursues such shadows to the marring of his present comfort, and the ruin of his immortal soul! Indeed the believer's disquietude about the difficulties of his path, and the treatment that he meets with, are not much more rational.

V. 7—13.

It is worthy of notice, that, in fact, we become happy in exact proportion, as we despair of happiness from this changing, sinful world; and wait and hope for it, from the mercy and all-sufficient love of God our Saviour. Instead of being much concerned about temporal things, let us earnestly pray to be "delivered from all our transgressions;" and that we may not be made a reproach to those, who, being foolish at all times, never so much expose their folly, as when they deride the hopes, or insult over the falls, of the righteous. We should look above instruments, and view the hand of God in all our afflictions: and then faith in his wisdom, justice, truth, and love; united with consciousness that he rebukes us for our iniquity; will render us silent and submissive, because he has done it. Then our prayers for the removal of his stroke, even when we "are consumed with the blow of his hand," will be offered with resignation to his will,
and hope in his mercy.—But if his fatherly chastisements of his children for their offences consume their strength and comeliness, as a moth fretteth away a garment; what will be the effect of his avenging wrath against his enemies! And as every man is vanity, it behoves sinners to David praises God for deliverance out of deep distress, and shews the benefit which would thence be derived to numbers; and the happiness of such as trust in God, 1—5. He declares that he had published God's righteousness and salvation; and pleads for deliverance from urgent troubles, and for the confusion of his enemies, with the triumphing of the righteous, 9—17.

make haste to seek forgiveness, before they go hence and be no more seen.—The Christian's sorrows are all sanctified; the gracious Lord will wipe away his tears, and answer all his prayers: he cannot but feel his afflictions; yet, as a stranger and a pilgrim on earth, he hopes for a better and more enduring habitation in heaven, where his heart and his treasure are already. He expects weariness and ill-treatment by the way: but his stay here will not be long; and, walking with God by faith, he goes forward on his journey, undiverted from his course, and not much cast down, by the ill accommodation or difficulties with which he meets. He only desires to be spared, till his measure of service on earth be finished, and his title to heaven clear; and that he may depart in that vigorous exercise of faith and grace, which may be honourable to God, encouraging to his brethren, and comfortable to himself. Then going hence, and being no more on earth, he enters upon his perfect and eternal rest; and leaves his pious friends consoled with the joyful hope of a blessed reunion; and instructed by his words and actions, how to live, to suffer, and to die. (Notes, Prov. xiv. 32. 1 Thes. iv. 13—18.)

NOTES.

PSALM XL. V. 1—5. In this psalm, David seems to have intended to speak of his own case and experience; but the Holy Spirit led him to use language, which in its full meaning can be applied to none but the Lord Jesus himself. The whole indeed may be accommodated to him, yet some passages are more suited to the case of the type, than to that of the Antitype.—These verses may be interpreted of the Redeemer's deep and dreadful sufferings, and the happy effects which followed his deliverance out of them. Exposed to the cruelty and malice of men, the horrid assaults of Satan, and the wrath of the Father, when bearing and expiating our sins; he was as one sinking in a dark and noisome pit, where dreadful noises are heard, (marg.) and he was ready to be covered and suffocated with the miry clay: but under all these sufferings, "in waiting he waited for the LORD;" and his earnest prayers were heard. At his resurrection he was brought forth from the grave, and the state of the dead: and in his exaltation he was placed as on an immovable rock; his goings were established, his remaining work became most delightful, and his full success was ensured. (Notes, Is. liii. 9—12. Acts ii. 22—32.) Thus "a new song" was put into his mouth, which he teaches his people: for no such redemption could before be celebrated; and multitudes, by faith beholding his sufferings and the glory which followed, have learned to fear the justice, and trust in the mercy of God, through him. Such persons are made happy; whilst they do not so regard the rich and great as to trust in them, or proud tyrants and persecutors so as to dread their rage; and while they renounce all connexion with those, who turn aside to idolatrous and superstitious delusions, or the deceitful interests and pleasures of sin. Many wonderful works the Lord had done for sinful man and for Israel; but this would exceed them all: nor could the number or value of his thoughts and contrivances of love and mercy be ever numbered, or estimated. (Notes, Eph. ii. 4—10. iii. 9—12. 1 Pet. i. 10—12. Rev. v. 11—14.)—Yet the passage may also be explained of David; and answers to some parts of the believer's experience.—David had been in many troubles, and seemed ready to sink in them, as in an horrible pit; but faith, patience, and prayer, supported him, and carried him through all: (Notes, cxvi. 3—5. cxxx. 1—6. cxlii. title. 7. 2 Sam. xxii. 5, 6, 17, 18. Jer. xxxviii. 1—13. Lam. iii. 52—66. Jon. ii.) In due time he was rescued, advanced, and established; his way was made plain and prosperous; a new song was put into his mouth; (Note, xxxiii. 2, 3;) his example became useful to many; and his life was spent in attempting to reckon up, and celebrate, the wonders and counsels of the love of God to him and to his people, yet he could not at all do justice to the delightful subject. (Notes, lxxi. 13—24. cxxxix. 17, 18. cxlv. 5—7.)—The third and fourth verses may be connected as follows: "Many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the LORD: Saying, Blessed is the man, &c." V. 6—8. It is uncertain, whether David had in these verses any intention of declaring, that cheerful and prompt obedience to the precepts of the moral law, proceeding from faith and love, was more acceptable to God than legal sacrifices: (Note, l. 7—15. 1 Sam. xv. 22:) but it is evident that the Holy Spirit foretold the obedience of the promised Messiah. Sacrifices, though appointed by God himself, were of no intrinsic value: he neither delighted in them, or required them for their own sake, nor could they take away sin. (Notes, Gen. viii. 20—22. Heb. ix. 18—26. x. 1—4. 11—18.) But the incarnation and obedience of the Son of God, which they shadowed forth, were previously appointed for that purpose. His ears were opened to receive and obey the command of the Father; or pierced as those of servants were, who chose to continue perpetually with their masters. (Note, Ex. xxi. 3—6.) When the legal sacrifices were declared inefficient, the Redeemer promptly answered, “Lo, I come, &c.” According to the eternal purpose of JEHOVAH, and as it was written in the scriptures from the beginning, or “the opening of the roll,” concerning him, he was prepared to appear in human nature, and to magnify the law of God by his perfect and divine obedience even unto the death of the cross: (Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. 21. iv. 3—5:) yea, his cordial love to the holy commandment, and his zeal for the honour of the divine government and perfections, and his compassion for the souls of men, were so powerful, that he delighted in thus performing the will of his heavenly Father. (Note, John iv. 31—34.)—The apostle, in quoting this passage, follows nearly the translation of the LXX, which gives an interpretation, rather than a translation, of the words rendered, “Mine ears hast thou opened.” But, as this variation did not at all affect his argument, or alter the meaning of the passage, it was not necessary, that he should interrupt his subject by noticing it. (Note, Heb. x. 5—10.)

V. 9, 10. When David avowed the earnestness and boldness, with which he had celebrated the works and ways of God, he typified Christ in the performance of ness and thy truth from the great congregation.

his prophetic office.—Neither reproach nor persecution had caused David to refrain his lips, from declaring before the congregation of Israel, the righteousness, faithfulness, loving-kindness, and salvation of the Lord. He had not been contented with treasuring up these subjects in his heart, for his private use: but had openly published them for the edification of the people, and the honour of God. Thus Christ, personally before his sufferings, and by his ministers afterwards, published to innumerable multitudes the justice, truth, and mercy of God; his method of justifying and sanctifying sinners, as well as the ways of righteousness in which he guides them. (Notes, 1—5. xxii. 22—25. xxxv. 17—19. Heb. ii. 10—13.)—The connexion of the term, “thy righteousness,” with loving-kindness, mercy, faithfulness, and salvation, and the evident subject of the passage, warrants this interpretation; and shews, that “the righteousness of God, which is unto all and upon all that believe,” was primarily meant. (Note, Rom. iii. 21—26.)

Preached. (9) בִּשְׂרָרָה. est, bono nuncio reficere, lætum nuncium indicare, ευαγγελιζεσθαι. Robertson.—Εὐαγγελισαμην. Sept.—This word, as thus used in the Old Testament, seems precisely to signify, preaching the gospel, proclaiming glad tidings; as a similar word does in the Arabick.

V. 11, 12. David might be here pleading for an interest in those mercies and that salvation, which he proclaimed to others; when he was struggling with those complicated evils, which were consequent to his iniquities in the matter of Uriah. These called his other sins to remembrance, which took such hold upon him, and so discouraged him, that he should not have dared to look up, if it had not been for his belief of the infinite mercies of God. But some think, that Christ may be supposed to speak, in the depth of his humiliation, when our innumerable iniquities met upon him, in his agony in the garden, and his sufferings on the cross. (Notes, lxxix. 4. Is. liii. 4—7. Matt. xxvi. 36—39. xxvii. 46.)—The original of the 11th verse is simply future: “Thou wilt not withhold, &c.”

is imperative, in which the Psalmist simply prays for deliverance: the others are throughout in the future tense, and naturally express the language of lively faith and hope, rather than that of wishing or desiring the destruction foreseen and predicted; and the transition is worthy our notice. A regard to the Septuagint, and other ancient versions, seems to have induced our venerable translators generally to put such passages in the imperative, which, at first view at least, gives them an appearance of harshness, not so congenial to the spirit of devotion. The two verses, however, viewed as predictions of the destruction, which awaits the obstinate enemies of Christ and his church, have been wonderfully accomplished in the dire end of many traitors and persecutors, and in the condition of the Jews to this day. (Notes, lxix. 22—28. cix. 6—20.)

V. 16. "All those who seek thee shall be glad and rejoice in thee; such as love thy salvation, shall say continually, The LORD be magnified." "I am confident, that this eventually will be the case; notwithstanding present temptations and sufferings."—The clause, "love thy salvation," exactly discriminates a true believer from all other men. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are here again called upon to contemplate the intense sufferings, into which our sins plunged the divine Saviour, when he willingly gave himself for us a sacrifice to God: and we should also mark his patient confidence in the Father under all; and observe how his prayers were heard, his soul delivered, and his body raised; and how, in human nature, he was exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour. In his exaltation all his people should rejoice: the new song, which was put into his mouth, was intended for our use, that we may render praises unto our God: (Note, Rev. v. 8—10:) and the whole interesting scene, and all the mediatorial power and grace of our exalted Saviour, were designed to warn sinners to flee from the wrath to come, and to put their entire trust in the mercy of the Lord. Happy are all they, who renounce every lying vanity and carnal confidence, thus to depend upon the living God: they shall continually experience the faithfulness of his promises; and contemplate with admiring gratitude all the counsels of his love, and his wonderful works in behalf of his redeemed people: nor will they be able to eternity to exhaust the subject, or to recount all the particular instances of his mercy to them. Yet the incarnation and suretyship, the obedience and sufferings, of the Son of God, are the centre and the means of all other mercies to us. (Notes, John iii. 16. xiv. 6. 1 John iv. 9—12.) Thus God is glorified, and sinners are saved: no costly sacrifices, nor even moral righteousness, can be acceptable from sinners to a holy God, except as they stand in relation to the person and atonement of his beloved Son.

In his obedience unto death, the eternal purposes of JEHOVAH were accomplished; the types and prophecies of the Old Testament were fulfilled; the law of God was magnified, and the demands of justice were satisfied. Humiliating and painful as this obedience was, the loving Saviour delighted to perform it: (Note, John iv. 31—34:) the law of God possessed his heart, and he was bent upon honouring its precepts and its awful sanction; that all might learn the excellence of the command, and the evil of transgression, in connexion with the infinite love of God to sinners. Now his redemption is completed, and the proclamation is sent forth to call upon us to come and accept of it. May we believe his testimony, trust his promise, and submit to his authority! For all who thus seek the Lord shall rejoice in him; and all "who love his salvation" will say continually, The Lord be magnified:" while the shame and ruin of impenitent sinners, especially of those who oppose his cause, or seek to destroy his people, and rejoice in their calamities, are ensured by the predictions and denunciations of the word of God, and even by his intercession for his church.—But if the holy Jesus, "the beloved Son, in whom the Father was well pleased," endured such innumerable evils, and became so poor and needy for our sake; shall we, whose "iniquities are more" in number than the hairs of our head," complain when we meet with pain and poverty! Had it not been for his voluntary sufferings, our sins would have taken such hold on us, that we should never have been able to look up: our hearts must indeed have failed, and in the horrible pit, whence there is no escape, our hopes would for ever have expired. Of this believers are fully convinced; and this should teach them patient submission under every trial. And if any are struggling with remorse of conscience, and fears of wrath, and, to their own apprehension, sinking in a deep and horrible pit; let them wait patiently for God, and cry humbly unto him, and he will hear and help them, and turn their fears and sorrows into joyful praises. If we are thus rescued, let us continue to pray that "our goings" may be established" in holiness, as a proof that we are fixed upon the Rock of salvation. And in order that our praises may be honourable to God and profitable to man, we should endeavour to unite humble dependence on Christ with obedient imitation of him. For those, who are really his, are taught to delight in doing his will, and have his law written in their hearts. Let us not then be ashamed of him or of his word; but declare his righteousness, truth, and salvation, according to our place in the church, to all around us. Let us put our whole trust in his mercy under every trial, and seek to him to make haste to help and deliver us; and to disappoint Satan and every foe, who seeks after our souls to destroy them. Though despised and obscure, let it suffice us, that the Lord thinks of us: and if he be our Help and Deliverer, he will make no long tarrying; but will soon remove us out of the reach of sin and sorrow: and at length raise our bodies from the grave

PSALM XLI.

David shews the blessedness of those who consider the poor, 1—3. He prays for mercy, and complains of the treachery and malice of his enemies, and the ingratitude of one who had been his friend, 4—10. He expresses confidence in God, and praises him, 11—13.

NOTES.

PSALM XLI. V. 1—3. It is generally agreed, that David wrote this Psalm during Absalom's rebellion, when, it seems, his other afflictions were accompanied with sickness: or rather he had previously been visited with some dangerous disorder, from which his enemies hoped he would not recover; and this emboldened them in their treasonable practices. (Notes, 4—8. xxx. 1, 2. xxxviii. 3—10.) Finding his own afflictions aggravated by their cruelty and perfidy; he was led to commend that temper of mind, which disposed a man to consider, and compassionate and relieve, the poor and afflicted; and to declare him happy who possessed it. Some render the first clause "Blessed is he that judgeth wisely of the poor:" "not 'condemning him as accursed whom God doth visit,' (as Job's friends did him;) 'knowing that there are divers 'causes why God layeth his hand upon us, yea and afterward he restoreth us.' It is, however, generally understood to refer to the considerate, active, and liberal kindness, shewn to the poor and afflicted, from genuine faith and love. (Marg. Ref. a.) Such a becoming conduct would ensure a gracious recompence from God; either exemption from the calamities, which in evil times befell others, the preservation of life, with many blessings, and protection from envious and spiteful enemies; or, in case of sickness, inward strength and various alleviations, (as when the bed of the sick is turned, and smoothed to aid their repose,) till health was restored, or till a peaceful death terminated all his sorrows.—It is astonishing to the student of scripture, in reading the most admired writings of pagan moralists, to observe, how entirely this branch of morality is omitted! Certainly it is peculiar to the scriptures, and to writings formed on them. (P. O. Deut. xv, conclusion.)

V. 4—8. David was conscious, that his affliction was a correction for his sins; and with humble confessions he pleaded especially for "the healing of his soul:" but his enemies reviled him, and impatiently expected his death, and hoped that his very name and memory would be disgraced. Recollecting their former behaviour, and comparing it with their conduct in following Absalom, he perceived that their apparent kindness, and their visits, were only intended to impose on him with vain professions of attachment, and to gain an opportunity of collecting materials of slander and reproach. They maliciously adverted to every one of his words, and every part of his behaviour; treasuring up in their mind whatever could be unfavourably interpreted, and then whispering it abroad among the people, to prejudice them against him and his government. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 1—11.) And, considering his malady as a proof of his guilt, ("a thing of Belial," marg.) they exulted in the hope that he would sink under it to rise no more.

V. 9. As David was a type of Christ, so was Ahithophel in some respects of Judas. The latter clause of this verse was fulfilled in Judas's ungrateful and cruel treachery. But Christ never trusted in him, as David had confided in Ahithophel; and therefore the former part was more suited to the type than to the Antitype. (Notes, lv. 12—15. 20, 21. cix. 2—5. 2 Sam. xv. 12. 31. xvi. 20—23. xvii. 1—4. John xiii. 18—30.)—"The sufferings of the church, 'like those of her Redeemer, generally begin at home; ... 4 ^h When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me: ^k for I had gone with the multitude; I went with them to the house of God, ^l with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holy-day.

5 ^m Why art thou ⁿ cast down, O my soul? and ^o why art thou disquieted in me? ^p hope thou in God: for I shall yet ^q praise him ^r for ^s the help of his countenance.

9 I will say unto ^d God my Rock, ^e Why hast thou forgotten me? ^f why go I mourning ^g because of the oppression of the enemy?

10 ^h As with a ⁱ sword in my bones, mine enemies reproach me; while they say daily unto me, ^j Where is thy God?

(Joel i. 20. Heb.) Thus David longed and mourned after the courts of God: but still more for the living God himself; for his presence and favour, and those pleasures, which he had enjoyed in communion with him. (Notes, lxiii. 1—4. lxxxiv. 1, 2. cxliii. 6. Matt. v. 6. Rev. vii. 13—17.) The want of these consolations was the more grievous, because his former confidence was now openly derided, and it was thought, that God had deserted him, and would not, or could not, afford him any relief. (Notes, 9, 10. iii. 1, 2. xxii. 7, 8.) These taunts and reproaches so distressed him, that he lost his appetite for his food, and tears were as his meat continually, his only solace and relief, day and night.

V. 4, 5. In this distressing situation, the Psalmist recollected former times, till his soul was even “poured out,” or melted, within him. (xxii. 14.) He had been used to accompany the multitude to the house of God, upon their solemn feast-days; and he counted it his chief honour and happiness, to join in their sacred songs of joy and praise: (Notes, 2 Sam. vi. 12—15. 1 Chr. xv, xvi:) but now he was driven as an exile far from that sacred scene; and Jerusalem itself was profaned by the wickedness of his adversaries. Yet still he was fully convinced, that he ought not to yield to despondency: he would therefore call his soul to account, for being thus cast down and disquieted; enquiring of it what adequate cause could be assigned for it. Past experience and repeated express promises combined to encourage his hope, that God would yet favour, comfort, and help him, which would be done effectually with a look or a smile; for “his presence is “salvation.” Margin. (Notes, 11. 1 Sam. xxx. 6.)

V. 6—8. As the Psalmist's dejection continued, notwithstanding his earnest strivings against it, he next complaints of it to his God; being resolved to remember him with faith, and hope, and prayer, though he was apparently turned to be his enemy; and though he was banished from mount Zion, into a remote part of the land beyond Jordan, to some little hill (marg.) in the land of Hermon. The word Mizar is justly rendered in other places, small, or little. (2 Chr. xxiv. 24. Is. lxiii. 18. Heb.) His sorrows were so complicated, and his outward calamities and inward anguish so combined, that he was like a ship in a violent storm, when assaulted by one billow after another, as if they called upon each other to concur in its destruction; while the water-spouts, rushing with impetuous force into the ocean, with a dreadful noise, also called upon it to unite in overwhelming the astonished mariners, who sink into the deep, where all the waves and billows go over them. Thus David seemed ready to be swallowed up by his enemies; who, along with his inward distresses, were as water-spouts, waves, and billows, with which God seemed ready to overwhelm him for his sins. (Notes, lxix. 14, 15. 2 Sam. xxii. 5, 6. Jon. ii. 3, 4.) Yet he trusted that he would command these storms into a calm. (Notes, cvii. 23—30. Matt. viii. 23—27.) He hoped that in due season, God would discover his loving-kindness to him, which would be as the return of the day to his soul; and therefore he would praise him for the past, and make his prayer unto him, as “the God of his life,” even in the darkest night of sorrow and trouble. Or, he resolved to make the mercies of every day the subject of his praise, and the encouragement of his hope and prayer during the night-season, when pain or uneasiness prevented his sleep. (Notes, Job xxxv. 9—13. Is. xxx. 29—32. Acts xvi. 25—28.)

V. 9, 10. The Psalmist was sensible, that God was chastening him for his sins; but he was also conscious of being truly penitent. He likewise knew that his cause was that of God and righteousness, and that his enemies hated him for his religion. So that he could not but wonder, on and restore him to his sanctuary, 1—3. He anticipates his joy and praise which should then take place, and encourages himself to hope in God, 4, 5.

V. 11. ‘This repetition doth declare, that David did not overcome at once; to teach us to be constant, for as much as God will certainly deliver his.’—The concluding words are rather varied: “The salvations of my countenance, and my God.” (Note, 4, 5.) The deliverances and consolations of God, his Salvation, had often made the Psalmist lift up his face with joy and gladness; and he trusted he should again praise him for similar mercies. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 8—11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer, in proportion to the degree in which he is spiritually-minded, will continually either be rejoicing in the living God, or mourning after him. The thirsty hart does not more eagerly pant and bray for the refreshing stream, than the lively Christian desires the consolations of the Holy Spirit, and the tokens of the love and presence of God: nothing else can afford him satisfaction; and temptations, afflictions, and discouraging delays increase the spiritual appetite, and make him the more to thirst for these living waters. He therefore values publick ordinances, and delights in attending on them; so that it is indeed a great affliction to him to be banished, or confined at a distance. Yet, unless he meet his God, and enjoy communion with him, he returns even from his courts disappointed and dissatisfied: and he looks especially with longing expectation for that season, when he shall appear before him in the temple above, and be for ever satisfied in his favour, and in that joy with which his manifested glory fills every enraptured beholder. (Note, Matt. v. 8.) But the comfort of his hope is often abated, and even turned into mourning, in this evil world, by the insults and blasphemies of those, who deride his confidence in God, as presumption or delusion; especially when he is under divine rebukes, or bereft of external advantages. In such seasons of distress and prevailing iniquity, he recollects more pleasant and prosperous days, when he assembled with the people of God, and joined in his worship with the voice of joy and praise; and, comparing them with present trials, he is apt to yield to impatience and despondency. It behoves us however, under every distress, to call ourselves to account; and to enquire why we are so cast down and disquieted. We may have great cause to mourn for sin, and to pray against prevailing impiety: but our great dejection, even under the severest outward afflictions or inward trials, springs from unbelief and a rebellious will: we should therefore strive and pray against it, and endeavour to hope in God, persuaded that we shall “yet praise him for the salvation of his countenance.” Our enemies may indeed drive us from publick ordinances, deprive us of our Bibles, banish us into deserts, or immure us in prisons; but they cannot bereave us of the favour of our God, or preclude our approach to the throne of grace. Let us then complain unto him, and remember his mercy and power, under every disconsolation. And if one trouble follow hard after another;—if divine rebukes from above, the assaults of hell from beneath, and the insults of men, like floods, waves, and water-spouts, seem to combine for our ruin;—let us remember that they all are appointed and over-ruled by the Lord, and that we deserve more than all we endure on earth: let us recollect how Jesus said, “My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death;” and how he suffered both from the cruelty of man, the rage of Satan, and the justice of the Father: yet was he heard and delivered. In his name, let us hope and pray: one word from him will calm every storm, turn the midnight darkness into the light of noon, and the bitterest complaints into joyful praises. We should then employ our time, under tedious and discouraging trials, in praising God for his mercies to his church and to us, and in prayer for deliverance. Ere long our night of sorrow will finally terminate, and eternal day will succeed. Let us then never think that “the God of our life,” and “the Rock of our salvation hath forgotten us;” if we have indeed made his mercy, truth, and power our refuge. Even though we cannot but “go mourning, because of the “oppression of the enemy;” and though the reproaches of the ungodly are painful as “a sword in our bones;” yet we should struggle against despondency, and still hope in God, and praise him: his favour will be the health and help of our souls, and he will be “our Shield and “exceeding great Reward.”

NOTES.

PSALM XLIII. V. 1. This is evidently a continuation of the preceding psalm, and was written before David had obtained deliverance. Every day brought him fresh intelligence concerning the ungodly, ungrateful, and unmerciful conduct of Israel in general; the bulk of the nation having joined the conspirators, and being ready to proceed to all lengths against the life of their aged king, which the deceit and iniquity of Absalom or Ahithophel could suggest against him. But these reports, instead of dismaying him, seem to have raised his hope; as they confirmed his confidence in the justice of his cause, and warranted his appeal to the Judge of the world, to decide between him and his most injurious foes. Perhaps the Psalmist also meant, the light of heavenly wisdom, teaching him how to act in such trying circumstances, so as to wait in the path of duty for the performances of God’s promises; and especially till restored to the ordinances of the sanctuary, which were far nearer to his heart, than the re-establishment of his outward prosperity, and the confirmation of his authority. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Under the returns of distress and disconsolation, we should, again and again, have recourse to the effectual and only remedy of faith and prayer.—As Israel treated David after all his successes in faithfully promoting their interests, and notwithstanding his wisdom and piety, with the blackest ingratitude, treachery, and injustice; and as even his beloved Absalom, and his professed friend and counsellor Ahithophel, joined and headed the base conspiracy; and as the Son of God met with far baser treatment from the same favoured, yet ungodly and merciless, nation: so no eminence or usefulness can exempt any pious man from the contempt or injuries of the wicked; whether he have to do with collective bodies, or individuals. But we should commit our cause to God, and he will plead it, and deliver us from every unrighteous and treacherous assault. And though inward temptations often concur with outward afflictions, yet God will never cast off those who trust in him as their Protector and Strength, according to his merciful and faithful promises. We should therefore discard such dishonourable fears; and pray the more earnestly, that the Lord would send forth the truth of his word and the light of his Spirit, to guide us into the ways of holiness, peace, and salvation: and by means of his ordinances on earth, bring us to his holy habitation in heaven. Through Christ, our Altar and Sacrifice, we may here find joy in God, for which we should bless and praise his name: but under every suspension of comfort, and every trouble, we should look forward to the season, when ‘God, our exceeding Joy,’ will end our sorrows and complete our felicity. Let us then silence our complaints, and repeatedly enquire, ‘Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou so disquieted within me?’ And resolve still to ‘hope in God; for we shall yet eternally praise him, who is the Health of our countenance and our God.’

NOTES

PSALM XLIV. V. 1—3. It is not agreed on what occasion, or by whom, this psalm was composed; nor does it fully suit any period in the history of the old-testament church: for even in the days of Hezekiah, under Sennacherib’s oppression, or afterwards, under the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the bulk of the nation could not have made the solemn protestation contained in it; (Note, 17—22;) and it would have been still more unsuitable to the case of the Jews, during the Babylonish captivity. It is therefore no very improbable conjecture, that David, or some other prophet, composed this psalm for the use of the true church, in every age, when persecuted for conscience-sake.—However this may be, the remnant of suffering believers are here introduced, as recollecting the work of God for Israel in former ages, to encourage their hope of his further protection and powerful interposition. (Marg. Ref.) The first verse is incorporated into our Litany, after a manner, suited to lead our thoughts to the triumphs of divine grace at the reformation, and in the age of the apostles.—Joshua and the Israelites fought valiantly against the Canaanites: yet their victories were not rendered to him, and that for ever.—“Glorying in God” is generally expressed, by another modification of the same verb. (Is. xlv. 25. Jer. ix. 23. Heb.)

V. 9—16. Israel, in general accustomed to victory by the help of JEHOVAH, is here represented as worsted and crushed by the enemy.—The Lord is pleased to permit his church to be run down, as if he had cast her off with abhorrence: his people are then plundered and oppressed: many are slain, as sheep, for the pleasure or profit of their persecutors; or driven from their native country, and scattered among idolaters and savages; or sold at a very low price like the meanest of slaves. Of all these events, the history of the church gives many affecting illustrations. Thus the Lord seems to sell his people for nought, and allow his enemies to prevail, even to his own dishonour; as if he parted with his flock, without any increase to his other wealth. And while these things are transacting, his people have trials of cruel mockings, insults, and reproaches; which they could the better endure, did they not also continually hear the name and truths of God blasphemed, by their impious and revengeful enemies.—Many of the verbs are in the future tense, in the original: and perhaps the Psalmist meant, that past calamities led the people to very doleful conclusions as to the event. (Marg Ref.—Notes, lx. 1—3. lxxiv. 1, 2. lxxix. 1—5. lxxxix. 38—45. Josh. vii. 6—9. Is. l. 1—3.)

V. 17—22. (Note, 1—3.) ‘Certainly we have deserved ‘...all’ these calamities; ‘though this comfort is still remaining, that we are not so wicked as to be moved by all ‘this to desert thee, and violate that covenant, whereby ‘we are engaged to worship thee alone.’ Bp. Patrick.—The formalist commonly escapes persecution, by turning with the stream, and purchasing security with sinful compliances, or open apostasy; but the true church of God cannot be prevailed on, by menaces, sufferings, or pro-owing to their own valour or strength, but to the power and favour of God. (Note, Josh. x. 9, 10.) The apostles laboured in the most zealous and self-denying manner to spread the gospel in the primitive times: but its prevalence was not the effect of their eloquence, or wisdom, or assiduity; but of the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven to prosper their labours. The conversion and salvation of the believer is not effected by his merit, wisdom, or resolution; but springs from the mercy and grace of God: yet he diligently uses the appointed means.—The people. (2) לְאֻמִּים: Or peoples, the several nations inhabiting Canaan. (Notes, 1 Sam. xii. 22. Rom. ix. 10—18.)

V. 4. “Thou art He, my King, O God: command ‘the salvations of Jacob.’ ‘Thou art the same almighty God and Saviour, who by thy sovereign will didst of old effect these wonderful deliverances to thy people.—Thou art our King, as thou wast their’s: therefore save and deliver us, as thou didst them.’ This is a never failing plea for the church under persecution, and for the believer when steadily resisting temptation, and for the minister in praying for success on his labours. (Notes, xxvii. 13. Matt. vi. 13.)

V. 5—7. God is frequently spoken of as a Horn, or as raising up for his church “a Horn of salvation;” (Notes, Deut. xxxiii. 7. 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3. Luke i. 67—75;) and the Psalmist, with allusion to that metaphor, says, “Through ‘thee will we push down our enemies.” For the cause of God must, to the end, be maintained by the same powerful aid, as from the first made it to prevail; and in the same entire dependence on him to prosper all the means, employed for that effect; and not by trusting in the means themselves. (Notes, xx. 6—8. 1 Cor. ii. 3—5. 2 Cor. iv. 7. x. 1—6.)

mises, to forget God, or deal falsely in his covenant: and as the believer's heart does not turn back from God, so his feet do not decline from his way. Neither the malice, nor the subtlety, nor the poison, of the old serpent, and of his progeny, even when permitted to torment him grievously, can induce him to turn aside to idolatry, or to renounce his God and Saviour. This has been proved in ten thousand instances, while the disciples of Christ have been covered as with the shadow of death, in their constant expectation of it; and they have seen their brethren killed, by every tedious excruciating method, "all the day long, "and accounted as sheep for the slaughter." (Notes, John xvi. 1—3. Rom. viii. 35—39.) Their regard to the authority of their holy and heart-searching God effectually preserves them even from committing secret wickedness; and they make their appeal to him concerning their integrity. And indeed so far from suffering for their iniquities, they are hated and killed for the Lord's sake; because they bear his image, profess his truths, adhere to his commandments, and seek his glory.—"The place of dragons," or serpents, or monsters, gives the idea of man cast into a situation, in which every hateful and dreadful creature surrounds him. Such are persecutors, and such are evil spirits who employ them. (Marg. Ref. s.)

V. 23—26. In this trying situation, the church earnestly cries for help to God, by whose permission these afflictions come upon her, and who alone can remove them. (Notes, xii. 5, 6. lxxiv. 10—12. lxxix. 8—13. Is. li. 9—11. Matt. viii. 23—27.) The company of believers plead their great misery; through oppression, and inward dejection, they are thrown prostrate, and trampled in the dust, and even cleave to the ground, as utterly unable to arise: and as God had sold them, so they pray him to redeem them by his power, and through the appointed ransom, that his mercies may be glorified in their help and deliverance. (Marg. Ref.)—"There is a time, when the triumphs of the adversary, and the afflictions of the church, tempt men to think, that the eye of Providence is closed, or turned away, and that the Almighty hath ceased to remember their sad estate. But the truth is, that God only giveth his people an opportunity of feeling their own insufficiency; and waiteth, till, by fervent and importunate prayer, they solicit his help. For so the holy Jesus slept, while the ship was covered with the waves; until, awakened by the cries of his disciples, he arose to their

^a assistance, and spoke the tempest into a perfect calm." Bp. Horne.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The church of God is one incorporated body, from the beginning to the end of the world: and the benefits conferred on it in every age, will be acknowledged with gratitude by believers, through all generations, and even to eternity.—"Whatsoever things were written of old time, "were written for our instruction" and encouragement; and parents should declare the work of God to their children, that they may learn to hope in him. (Notes, lxxviii. 3—8. Is. xxxviii. 17—20. Rom. xv. 4—7.) When we hear of the wonderful works wrought for Israel, in bringing them out of Egypt, and settling them in Canaan; or of the still more glorious interpositions of God, in the first promulgation of his gospel; we should learn to hope and pray for displays of his power and love, equally efficacious, though not miraculous.—The prosperity of the church has always been attended with the ruin of her enemies; therefore the most prosperous despisers and persecutors have cause to tremble, on account of the prayers of God's afflicted and despised people.—As human policy, power, and authority could never prevail against the cause of God; so they have been very little employed in promoting it: but, whatever instruments have been used, all real advantages have been gained by "his right hand, his arm, and "the light of his countenance, because he had a favour" to his people. They therefore give him the whole glory of the past, and entirely confide in him for the future; and they prosper in their spiritual warfare, when they depend on his grace and go forth in his name.—"Where the word "of this King is, there is power:" when he "commands "deliverances for Jacob," they will take place: and we may "push down all our enemies," and "tread them under "that rise up against us;" when, like the servants of God of old, we disclaim all self-confidence, to trust in him alone. The Lord has always hitherto saved his people: they may now "boast in him all the day long;" and they will praise his name for ever, for not having made them ashamed of their confidence. Yet, the believer must have seasons of temptations, afflictions, and humiliating discouragements; and the church must have seasons of persecution, when her remaining witnesses prophesy in sackcloth. (Note, Rev. xi. 3—6.) At such times the people of God will be trampled on, put to shame, plundered, murdered, banished, enslaved, despised, and reproached: and they will be ready to think that he has cast them off, and to fear that his name and truth will be eventually dishonoured; while they continually hear the blasphemies and triumphs of his enemies. But in all our afflictions, especially in our sufferings for the sake of scriptural Christianity, we should complain unto the Lord, and “exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence:” we should be careful not to seek relief by sinful compliances; and should continually meditate on the power, truth, purity, and knowledge of our heart-searching God. If our heart turn back from him, or our steps decline from his way; he knows it, and will discover it to others. But if we are faithful to our engagements, and are “persecuted for ‘righteousness’ sake,” we are and shall be safe and happy. Even if we should be given up into the hands of enemies, formidable and venomous as dragons, and thrown into dungeons hideous as their holes; be sore broken with every torture which malice can invent, and live in the continual expectation of a violent death: yet nothing can “separate us from the love of our God;” none can go beyond his purpose and permission; and in all these things we shall be more than conquerors. (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—39.) For though he seems to hide his face, and to forget the affliction and oppression of his people, while they are trampled in the dust by antichristian persecutors; yet he is waiting for our more fervent prayers, which will cause him, as it were, to awake, and arise, and help, and redeem us for his mercies’ sake. We have reason to be thankful, considering our frailty, for exemption from the more violent species of persecution; but let us be careful, that prosperity and ease do not render us careless and lukewarm. We should remember that persecution may come on us speedily, and that we ought to prepare for it; and we should not forget the state of the church, not yet delivered from her bondage and captivity. But in answer to the Redeemer’s intercession and the prayers of his people, all that hate his cause shall be put to shame; truth and righteousness shall every where triumph; and none that belong to Christ shall be cast off for ever, but every one of them shall be completely and eternally saved.

NOTES.

PSALM XLV. Title. The word “Shoshannim” signifies lilies, and is several times so rendered in Canticles: as used, however, in the titles of a few Psalms, (Marg. Ref. a,) it is generally understood to mean an instrument of six strings.—This Psalm is entitled, “A song of loves;” and it evidently describes the mutual love, which subsists between Christ and his church. In many respects it resembles the Song of Solomon; and it treats of the spiritual union between Christ and the church under the allusion of a marriage. (Notes, Eph. v. 22—31.) Most expositors maintain that it was written on Solomon’s marriage with Pharaoh’s daughter; but a great part of it is wholly inapplicable to that transaction: nor is there sufficient ground to support the decided opinion, that this was so much as the occasion of its being written, or that David composed it. The latter is indeed probable; but it is entirely a prophecy of Christ, and is quoted as such by the apostle. (Comp. 6, 7. with Heb. i. 8, 9.)

V. 1. The inspiration of the Holy Spirit stirred up in the prophet’s heart this meditation, on a most excellent and important subject, as water bubbles up in a fountain: (marg.) so that he spoke freely of the things, which he had been considering, and had “composed concerning the “King,” the promised Messiah; and his tongue was guided by the Spirit of God, as entirely as the pen is by the hand of a ready writer, to express promptly and fully “the mind of the Spirit,” and nothing more. This seems the genuine meaning: for as the tongue utters more rapidly, than the readiest writer can note down the words; the clause, in the common interpretation, conveys no distinct idea. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, 2. John xvi. 14, 15. 1 Cor. ii. 10—13. 1 Pet. i. 10—12. 2 Pet. i. 19—21.)

V. 2. In speaking “concerning the King,” the prophet was led abruptly to address him; as one in a rapture while he contemplated his glorious excellences. He was formed more beautiful and lovely than the children of men: (Cant. v. 16. Note, Zech. ix. 17:) he unspeakably surpassed all, who ever were admired or extolled on earth, for wisdom, justice, truth, and love; without having any intermixture of infirmity or defect. His word reveals the unsearchable riches of his grace: and, being authorized to speak to sinners, as their Prophet, in the Father’s name, “grace is poured into his lips,” and his words are full of energy, instruction, persuasion, and consolation: and being in every respect fully qualified for his mediatorial work, God has exalted and blessed him for ever, in order to the completion of it.—“His word instructed the ignorant, resolved the doubtful, comforted the mourners, reclaimed the wicked, silenced his adversaries, healed diseases, troubled the elements, and raised the dead.” Bp. Horne. (Notes, Cant. v. 10—16. Is. l. 4. Luke iv. 16—22. John vii. 40—53.)

V. 3—5. The prophet here joyfully foretels the progress and success of the Messiah, in setting up his kingdom and overcoming his enemies. Girded with the word of truth, rendered effectual by the power of the Holy Spirit, as with a sharp sword, let him ride forth as a mighty Conqueror, in unrivalled might, glory, and majesty, to spread truth, meekness, and righteousness on earth; (Notes, Is. lxiii. 1—6. Rev. vi. 1, 2. xix. 11—16;) bringing his people into a state of acceptance and peace with God; and teaching them to live in humble meekness, peace, and equity with each other. For his right hand, expert in this warfare, would readily execute his purposes, whether of mercy or of vengeance. (Notes, ii. 7—9. cx. 3—6.) His arrows of conviction are very sharp, and the effects of them very terrible, for a time, in the hearts of sinners, till they are humbled, subjected, and reconciled: but the arrows of his righteous vengeance are unspeakably more sharp and dreadful to his obstinate enemies, when they fall under that power to which they refused to submit. (Notes, xxi. 8—13. lxvi. 1—3. lxviii. 17—23.)

V. 6, 7. The victorious Conqueror is here introduced as placed on his royal throne: and the prophet not only celebrates him as far superior to all the sons of men, but as being himself "God over all." His everlasting kingdom, which he possesses for the benefit of his church, is administered with perfect wisdom and equity: his character, doctrine, precepts, and, above all, his atoning sacrifice, shew that he "loveth righteousness and hateth iniquity." Therefore God the Father, as "his God," in respect of his human nature and mediatorial offices, (Note, John xx. 11—17, end,) has given him the Holy Spirit, without measure: that, being thus anointed to be our Prophet, Priest, and King, he might have the pre-eminency in the gladdening gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit the Comforter; and from his fulness might communicate them to his fellows, his brethren in human nature. (Notes, Is. lix. 20, 21. Zech. xiii. 7. John i. 16. iii. 27—36. Eph. iv. 7—13.)—Various attempts have, in different ages, been made to explain away this decisive testimony to the Deity of Christ; but the manner in which the apostle quotes it, rather varied from the Septuagint and made more energetic, is conclusive to all who admit his authority.—Some would render the words, "God is thy throne for ever and ever." Heaven indeed is the throne of God; but who ever heard of God being the throne of any of his creatures! (Marg. Ref.—Note, Heb. i. 8, 9.)

V. 8. The garments of princes were generally imbued with costly perfumes: those of the high priests were anointed with the holy ointment, composed of the spices here mentioned, with several others. (Notes, cxxxiii. 2. Ex. xxx. 22—33.) Thus the Messiah is represented as clothed with garments, which diffuse a refreshing fragrant through his royal palace, his church on earth, and in heaven, in which he more rejoices, than magnificent princes do in palaces inlaid with ivory. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xxi. 1—7.)—'From the glorious vestments of our High Priest and King is diffused the sweet savour of his heavenly graces, filling those happy regions of joy and gladness, where he keeps his residence above; and, by the communication of his Spirit, refreshing the faithful on earth with their odours.' Bp. Horne.—Aloes.] Note, Num. xxiv. 6.

V. 9—11. The King, now seated in majesty and glory on his throne, is next represented as surrounded with a splendid train. Among other honourable women, the daughters of Kings are mentioned, who may be supposed to have submitted to his authority, and put themselves under his protection; and who would deem it an honour for their daughters to wait, in his court, around his queen; while she, arrayed in the most costly robes, stood at his right hand, as a bride adorned for her nuptials. By "the queen," the collective body of believers seems to be intended, who, clothed in the righteousness of Christ, enriched by his bounty, and adorned by the graces of his Spirit, adhered to him in singleness of affection and fidelity, and are admitted to the most endeared union and communion. The other attendants are either introduced, according to the customs of the times on such occasions, to keep up the allegory; or they may mean distinct churches or individuals who in succession seek to be admitted into this sacred relation. (Notes, 12—15. Cant. i. 5, 6. v. 9.)—The royal consort is next exhorted, as it seems, by the Father himself, to hearken, consider, and consent to, the terms of this union: and, in order to enter into it, and act properly in it, she must forget her own people.

and her father's house. The whole church, composed of Jews and Gentiles, consists of such as were born in sin: and separation from all idolatry, iniquity, and self-dependence, and from all the carnal interests, pleasures, and attachments of an unconverted state, must make way for receiving Christ as their whole Portion and Salvation. (Note, Gen. xii. 1—3.) When grace has thus prepared the heart, there is a spiritual beauty with which the Redeemer is greatly delighted; and the soul is ready to submit to him as Lord, and to worship him as God, with unreserved obedience and humble adoration; as well as to cleave to him in love, and trust in him as a Saviour. (Notes, Cant. iv. 8—14. Is. liv. 4, 5. lxxii. 1—5. John iii. 27—36. 2 Cor. xi. 1—6. Eph. v. 22—27. Rev. xix. 7, 8.)

V. 12. The accession of the Gentiles to the church may be here predicted, under the name of Tyre, a neighbouring city, and at that time the mart of the world: for even the richest among the nations will in due time submit to the Messiah, consecrate their wealth to him, and court the friendship and desire the prayers of his church. (Notes, Is. lx. 1—14. Zech. viii. 20—23. Rev. iii. 8, 9.)

Thy favour.] תִּפְתָּח: the pronoun is feminine, and the queen, the church, is especially meant.

V. 13—15. The relation, in which the believer stands to the Lord, comprises in it every tie and affection; and the church is called his spouse, sister, or daughter, indiscriminately: or the title "spouse," or "bride," may express her relation to the Son of God; and "daughter," that to the Father. Her glory and beauty are inward and spiritual: and her adorning is most precious; as she is arrayed with the righteousness which Christ wrought out in human nature for her justification, and with the beauties of a holy conversation by the operation of the Spirit of God; who works by the labours of ministers, and by all the means, which others diligently use, to promote the sanctification of themselves and of their brethren. (Notes, 1 Pet. iii. 1—4. Rev. xix. 7, 8.) When the church is thus prepared, this union is begun on earth, which will be completed and avowed in the King's palace above: while every individual, whose affection and dependence have been singly placed on Christ, shall be admitted as a guest at these nuptials, and likewise share for ever in the joy and honour of this sacred union. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. xxv. 1—13.)

V. 16. While the church forgets and renounces all worldly connexions, interests, and affections, in order to her espousal to Christ, a spiritual progeny, a numerous succession of converts, arises from this new and sacred relation. (Notes, xxii. 30, 31. Gen. xii. 1—3. Matt. xix. 29, 30. 2 Cor. vi. 14—18. Phil. iii. 8—11.) These are "kings" and priests to our God, and reign even on earth," as in reality the most honourable persons in every land. (Notes, 1 Pet. ii. 4—6. 9, 10. Rev. i. 4—6. v. 8—10.) Many of them have been raised to great authority and possessed great influence in their several countries: and, however the church has hitherto been generally despised and persecuted, the time is coming when her sons shall be made kings and rulers through all nations, as well as heirs of an eternal kingdom in heaven. (Notes, Is. xlix. 18—23. liv. 1—5. lx. 1—7. lxxv. 13—16. Gal. iv. 21—31.)—Instead of Jewish ancestors or kindred, an illustrious race of gentile believers, 'of whom were to be chosen Christian kings to 'govern the world, and Christian bishops to preside in the 'church.' Bp. Horne.—But the church renounces none of the Jewish race; except unbelievers, in exactly the same way, as she renounces unbelieving gentiles.—Solomon had, as far as we know, no children by Pharaoh's daughter: and nothing can be less applicable to any one, than the seventeenth verse is to her. So that if Solomon's marriage to her were at all intended, this part of the prediction especially wholly failed of being accomplished. (Note, Heb. i. 8, 9.)

V. 17. This verse shews, that Christ and the church were immediately and expressly intended throughout the Psalm. The language is peculiarly emphatical; and can mean nothing less, than all successive generations to the end of the world, and likewise eternal ages in heaven. Either the Father himself thus declared his purpose of glorifying his beloved Son, and his people with him, for ever; or, as many explain it, the Psalmist foresaw, that this sacred poem would be used by the church through all generations, in celebrating the honour of the Redeemer, and in calling on others to do the same; and that it would thus be useful in preparing the redeemed people of God, for the exalted adorations of the eternal world.—There can be no doubt, that this will be verified by the event. (Notes, lxxi. 17, 18. lxxii. 17—19.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The difference of men's characters, before God, greatly consists in the thoughts which habitually occupy their minds. The lively believer has his memory, imagination, and affections, so stored with heavenly things, that he has commonly some good matter to meditate on, in those hours of solitude and leisure, which others waste in vanity, or employ in wicked and polluting speculations. (Note, cxix. 113.) But no subject is so congenial to the heaven-born soul, or so replete with comfort and instruction, as the contemplation of the excellences of Christ our King. Lively thoughts of his Person, character, and grace, springing up in the heart, inspire a heavenly savour into the discourse: and without the gift of prophecy, our tongues in this case become as the pen of a ready writer, simply and promptly declaring to all around us the truths originally revealed by the Spirit of God.—In the Redeemer, the enlightened soul perceives unutterable goodness and beauty, which eclipse all the dim excellences, that it was wont to admire in the children of men. The gracious words which he speaks to sinners, are replete with divine harmony, and excite ineffable comfort in the broken heart: and Christ himself rejoices in his exaltation, and in the power and glory which the Father has conferred on him; because he delights in bestowing on his people the blessings, which he obtained for them on the cross.—All, who have seen his glory and tasted his grace, greatly desire to promote his cause; they rejoice in his former victories, and long to see him “ride forth in his majesty” to extend his conquests; and by his word and Spirit, to reduce enemies and strangers to a willing submission to his truth, and righteousness, and gentle dominion. But, while he delights in salvation, his powerful right hand will teach him to execute dreadful vengeance on all impenitent opposers: his sharp arrows will penetrate their souls; and all must either yield to this almighty King, or be crushed by him. For his throne is established for ever; his name is Emmanuel; his sceptre is swayed in justice and mercy; “he loveth righteousness and hateth iniquity:” and while his Spirit leads believers to look unto him, as “bearing our sins in his own body on the cross,” and to rest all their hopes on his atonement; the views which they receive of this great transaction, especially impress them with a sense of the odiousness and desert of every transgression, shew them the reasonableness of obedience, and teach them the beauty of holiness; so that, not one of them can possibly abuse his grace for an encouragement to continue in sin.—In proportion as we are conformed to his holy image, we may expect the gladdening influence of the Comforter, which is communicated from his fulness: and while his name is to us, “as ointment poured forth;” the fragrant of heavenly affections will recommend our conversation to the spiritually minded, and render us meet for his palace above. (Notes, Cant. i. 3. 2 Cor. ii. 14—17.)

PSALM XLVI.

V. 9—17.

Next to the Redeemer's excellences, those of his espoused church are most worthy to be celebrated: not for what she was in herself; but for what he has made her, in consequence of his love and choice. (Notes, Cant. iv. 1—15. vi. 4—10. vii. 6—8. Ez. xvi. 9—14.) If we desire to share these blessings, we must hearken to his word, consider his proposals, and incline our ears and our hearts to seek a union with him: we must renounce, and even forget, our carnal and sinful attachments, pursuits, and connexions, if we would be pleasing in his eyes, or admitted into this honourable relation. Other lords must be disavowed; for he must be our Lord, as well as our Saviour: and all idols must be thrown away, that we may give him our whole heart, and render him unreserved worship, as well as seek all our happiness from him alone. (Note, Gen. ii. 24. P. O. Gen. xxiv. 33—67.) Indeed, the true believer's privileges, as well as the most estimable parts of his character, are internal, and undiscerned by an ungodly world: yet the holiness of his conversation proves the inward adorning of his soul, and that he is arrayed with “the robe of righteousness and salvation.”—No wonder that the prosperity of the Redeemer's cause, and the conversion of sinners to him, delight all those on earth, who are pure and upright in heart; seeing angels, who never sinned, “rejoice over one sinner that repenteth:” (Notes, and P. O. Luke xv. 1—10:) what then will be the joy, and mutual congratulations, and harmonious praises, which shall attend the final admission of all the redeemed to the full possession of their purchased inheritance!—Those who are taught of God, however great in the world, will count it their honour to attend on Christ our King, and to employ their wealth and influence for the good of his church. And such as leave all for him, shall be abundantly compensated even in this world, in new and spiritual relations, friends, and honours. To be a child of God, to be espoused to Christ, and made an heir of heaven, are the highest of all possible distinctions: this honourable race shall be continued and multiplied until the end of time, and at length shall possess and fill the earth; and thus shall the name of the Redeemer be remembered in all generations, and his people praise him for ever and ever. Amen, and Amen.

NOTES.

PSALM XLVI. Title. As the sons of Korah were principal singers in the sanctuary through successive generations, the title alone does not determine the date of this Psalm. It is not known by whom, or when, it was written: but the ancient opinion, that it was composed on occasion of the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib's invasion, is very probable; though some think it was composed by David, after his victories over the Ammonites and Syrians. (Note, xlvi. 1.) It is however, well adapted to the use of the church, especially on great emergencies, in every age.—When Luther received any discouraging news, he used to say, ‘Come, let us sing the ‘forty-sixth Psalm.’

Alamoth.] (Note, 1 Chr. xv. 20, 21.) ‘Alamoth is thought to be either some tune in common use, or some kind of musical instrument, unknown to us; in which young virgins, as some fancy, took a peculiar delight, and were wont to learn to play upon it, which they make the reason and original of its name.’ Bp. Patrick.—“Alamoth” signifies virgins.

“present Help in trouble,” may be rendered more literally, “found exceedingly a Help in troubles;” or, “a Help most readily to be found in troubles.” The Psalmist’s experience, and that of all believers from the beginning, evinced it; and this encouraged his present unshaken confidence: whereas all who call on idols, or on any creature, to help them in trouble, are invoking the absent, as well as the helpless.—Earthquakes, and other terrible convulsions in nature, are often made emblems of great commotions in nations, the fall of empires, revolutions, and other public calamities. But if imagination should be employed to conceive of such desolations, as are not likely to be realized, in the full literal import of the terms here used, till the consummation of all things; still the presence and power of an almighty Protector and Upholder would suffice to secure the church and every true member of it: and strong faith would exclude terror even in the prospect of such tremendous scenes. (Notes, Is. xxv. 9. xxvi. 3, 4. 20, 21. xxxii. 16—20. Luke xxi. 25—28. 2 Pet. iii. 10—13.)

V. 4. Perhaps, the gentle streams which watered Jerusalem may be alluded to: (Note, Is. viii. 6—9:) but “the River of the water of life,” the graces and consolations of the Holy Spirit, which pervade every part of the church, the city of our God; and through which his sacred ordinances revive and rejoice the hearts of afflicted believers, are particularly intended. (Notes, Ex. xvii. 5, Ez. xlvii. 1—10. John iv. 10—15. vii. 37—39. Rev. xxii. 1.)

V. 5. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xii. 4—6. Zeph. iii. 14—17. Zech. ii. 10—13. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.)—Right early. Or, “When the morning appeareth:” (marg.) that is, “In good time, when the help shall be most honourable to God and profitable to his people.” “God, when there is any danger, will send us seasonable and speedy relief against those that invade us.” Bp. Patrick. (Notes, cxxv. 1, 2.)

V. 6. Nothing can be more concise, energetick, and sublime than this verse. (Note, Ex. xv. 9, 10.)—Many deliverances afforded to Israel answer the description, especially that under Hezekiah: but the success of the gospel notwithstanding all opposition of every kind, and from every quarter, which melted away before the blessing of God on the preaching of the apostles and evangelists, was a singular accomplishment of it; (Marg. Ref.—Notes, ii. 1—6;) and it shall ere long have a still more glorious completion, in the destruction of every antichrist, and the universal prevalence of genuine Christianity.

V. 7. ‘The LORD of armies, the God of Jacob, who redeemed him from all evil, is with us his descendants, according to his promise: what then have we to fear?’—EMMANUEL, GOD WITH US, is in every age the Refuge and Protector of his church. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8, 9. The Psalmist here calls on all people, to contemplate the wonders which God had wrought for his people, and the desolations which he had made among their powerful enemies: for he had made wars to cease to the ends of the earth, by disabling all who had delighted in them, and utterly destroying all their weapons and preparation of war. (Notes, 2 Kings xix. 35—37. 2 Chr. xx. 21—30.)—He will hereafter put an end to all wars, by the universal success of the gospel of peace; and this event also may be foretold. (Notes, Is. ii. 2—5. Mic. iv. 1—4. Rev. xx. 4—6.)

V. 10. God himself here speaks, and demands silent and adoring attention, and submission from the whole earth; and that they all should acknowledge, and bow down to, his universal, everlasting, and absolute sovereignty, if they would escape his awful vengeance. (Notes 2 Kings xix. 14—19. v. 19. Is. ii. 22. xxxiii. 10—13. Hab. ii. 20.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those who have received Jesus Christ as their Lord and Saviour, and live in grateful obedience to him, make the power, wisdom, truth, and love of God, their “refuge and strength;” and in every urgent danger and trouble, they will find him a ready and a present Help. If our faith were as strong as our security is good, we need fear no combination of enemies, no revolutions in kingdoms, and no convulsions in nature; but in the most tremendous dangers, might triumph in the fullest assurance of security and victory. Were we literally to behold the deep-rooted mountains torn from their foundations, and cast into the ocean, while its impetuous waves overflowed the banks, and deluged the earth; we should not only be safe, but might be happy, if, in communion with God, we drank of the river of divine consolations, which he has communicated to his holy church on earth, as an earnest of heavenly joys. Let us then pray for increase of faith, and be careful to lay up our treasures in heaven: thus, when the earth and all its works shall be burnt up, we shall have nothing to fear, or to lose. Happy are they, in every case, who are enrolled citizens of the holy city of our God, in which he dwells as a Father, a Defender, and a Comforter of his people. While the heathen rage, their faith and patience will indeed be tried; yet He will utter his voice, their enemies will perish, and they shall triumph in praise. But let the ungodly tremble at beholding the destruction of those, who have opposed the cause and people of God: ere long the Lord will convert or destroy every adversary; and “the nations shall beat their swords into “plow-shares and learn war no more.” Let us pray for the speedy approach of these glorious days; and, in silent reverence and submission, worship and trust in our almighty Sovereign. And through life and death, let us answer every fear by the believing consideration, that “the “LORD of Hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our Refuge.”

NOTES.

PSALM XLVII. V. 1—3. This psalm is generally ascribed to David, though his name is not affixed to it: and it is thought to have been composed when very great multitudes were assembled, to attend on the removal of the ark to the tabernacle on mount Zion. (Notes, 2 Sam. vi. 1 Chr. xv.) And as the ark was a type of Christ, the psalm has generally been applied to his ascension, after his humiliation on earth, to the right hand of God in heaven. Thus the ancient fathers understood it, and on this account it is appointed in our church to be read on Ascension-day. (Notes, xxiv. 7—10. lxxviii. 1—3. 15—18.)—A large congregation having been assembled, as at a solemn festival, the Psalmist calls on them to express the overflowing joy of their hearts, by clapping their hands, and lifting up their voices in triumphant shouting: (Marg. Ref. a, b:) because the most high God, whom Israel worshipped, and who protected Israel, was terrible to his and to their enemies, and the great Sovereign of all the earth.—In the days of Joshua, and afterwards by David, he had destroyed, or subdued, the nations of Canaan and the adjacent countries, and brought them under the dominion of Israel: but these victories were only shadows of the spiritual triumphs of the church under her king Messiah; and at length all nations shall either be joined to her in subjection to Christ, or shall be destroyed. (Notes, Dan. ii. 44, 45. Rev. xi. 15—18.)—Terrible. (2) The same word (תָּרַס) is rendered reverend, cxi. 9.

V. 4. The goodly land of Canaan was selected for the inheritance of Jacob's posterity, who were especially favoured by God, and raised to a pre-eminence above other nations; and comparatively they were the excellent of the earth. But they have long been excluded from that country; which typified the present privileges and chosen inheritance of the true Israel, who are in reality what the Israelites were in external character. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. ‘God is gone up, by the special token of his ‘presence, into the holy place, with shouts of joy and ‘praise.’ Bp. Patrick.—If, however, we consider this, as prefiguring the ascension of Him, in our nature, who is “God over all, blessed for evermore;” and the acclamations of the heavenly hosts on that grand occasion; the whole appears far more interesting, and becomes in the highest degree animated and appropriate, as introductory to the repeated call to fervent praises. (Notes, lxxviii. 17—20. 24, 25. Luke xxiv. 50—53. Acts i. 9—12. Eph. iv. 7—10. Phil. ii. 9—11.)

V. 6, 7. Our King. (6) The Messiah is continually celebrated in the psalms as Israel's King; it is therefore most natural to interpret this expression of him in almost every part of them; which leads us to multiplied proofs that he is JEHOVAH, and the Lord of all. (Notes, ii. 4—6. xlv. 1—5. Zeph. iii. 14—17. Zech. ix. 9, 10. xiv. 6—9. Matt. xxv. 34—40.)—With understanding. (7) Maschil. (Marg.—Note, xxxii. title.)

The praises of God are celebrated, in connexion with the beauty and security of Zion, and the deliverances wrought for her, 1—8. The church praises God, and rejoices in him, and in her privileges, 9—14.

V. 8, 9. The manner in which the dominion over the nations of the earth as exercised by that God, who dwelt in the holy place, by the ark the symbol of his presence, above the mercy-seat, is here mentioned, seems a clear intimation of the calling of the gentiles into the church, in consequence of Christ's ascension. (Rom. xv. 12.)—All the principal persons, from the several tribes of Israel, “the people of the God of Abraham,” assembled to remove the ark, leaving the protection of their houses and families unto God, who accordingly was the Shield of the land. Thus when princes and rulers join themselves to the Lord Jesus, and use their authority and influence for the benefit of the church; God is greatly exalted, in becoming the Shield and Defender of their dominions.—Some, however, interpret the last clause to mean the rulers themselves; who, belonging to God, having their authority from him, and using it according to his command, become the shields of their people; and thus by their means God is greatly exalted and honoured among men. The heathen. (8) גוֹיִם: or “the nations;” over all the nations of the earth, and not only over Israel.—The princes of the people. (9) נְדִיבֵי עַמִּים. Or, “of the peoples” (plural). The rulers of other nations must be meant, as uniting with those of Israel: and this leads us to interpret the passage, of the conversion of the gentiles to the ascended Saviour, rather than of the typical transaction of the removal of the ark.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The universal and absolute sovereignty of our holy God would be most terrible to every sinner, were it not administered by his incarnate Son from a mercy-seat: but now, it is terrible to the obstinate workers of iniquity alone.—While his peculiar people express their confidence, gratitude, and joy, by every token of external exultation, and animate each other in his service; let sinners submit to his authority, and accept of his salvation, that they may share in this holy triumph. If we are the chosen people of God, and his love and grace have made us more excellent than our unbelieving neighbours; we may be sure that he has chosen for us a more honourable and excellent inheritance, than all the kingdoms of the world; and that he will prepare our souls for that inheritance, by every dispensation here on earth. Let us then confide in his wisdom, submit to his will. and be thankful for his distinguishing mercy.—As angels and glorified saints worshipped the ascending Saviour, and welcomed him with shouts of joy and the trump of God: surely we on earth should join our praises with holy affections; and with understanding of his excellency and our obligations, that we may glorify him and edify others also. Our backwardness to this reasonable service must be overcome by repeated exhortations; and when our hearts are attuned to this holy worship, we should call on all around to unite in it: for he is our King, “and the King of all the earth.” “He reigneth upon the throne of his holiness,” which yet well consists with his plenteous mercy: all the heathen are his inheritance and property: may he hasten the time, when all kings shall serve him, and use their delegated authority to his glory! Then will “all the families of the earth be blessed in him,” and he will be greatly exalted: while, as the God of Abraham, he becomes their “Shield, and exceeding great Reward.”

NOTES.

PSALM XLVIII. V. 1. Many think, that this psalm was composed on account of the deliverance of Jerusalem from the power and rage of Sennacherib: but others are of opinion, that it is more exactly descriptive of the invasion of the land during the reign of Jehoshaphat, and the extraordinary triumph of him and his subjects over the kings who had confederated against him. (Notes, 2 Chr. xx. 1—30.) It is however evident, that it was occasioned by some remarkable interposition of God, in rescuing “the mountain of his holiness” from powerful assailants.

V. 2, 3. The situation of Zion, with the adjacent region, was very beautiful, and the glory and joy of the whole land: but the experience of her kings, from age to age, that God was their Refuge, and the Protector of their palaces, as well as of his own holy temple, was the peculiar honour of this holy city.—Zion is supposed to have been situated on the south side of the mountain; but the temple stood on the north side of it, and was its peculiar honour and distinction. (Is. xiv. 13.)

V. 4—7. The confederated kings of idolatrous nation were assembled to besiege Jerusalem; but the pious princes of Judah confided in God as their Refuge. Their invader therefore, when they approached the walls, were suddenly intimidated, troubled, and put to flight, with terror and anguish, as a woman in travail; or as the affrighted mariners look at each other, when a furious east wind drives their stout and richly laden ship upon a rock, and dashes it in pieces. These effects could not be so much ascribed to the sight of Jerusalem's fortifications, as to the immediate power of God; even as the winds and waves are at his command. (Marg. Ref.)—‘Illustrations of this kind are sometimes introduced, by the sacred writers, with the mark of comparison; and frequently, as here, without it. The meaning evidently is, that as the east wind shatters in pieces the ships of Tarshish, so the divine power struck the heathen kings with terror and astonishment.’ Bp. Horne.

V. 8. The princes and people of Judah had often heard of the wonderful deliverances, which God had in former ages vouchsafed to Israel, as well as the encouraging promises and predictions sent to them by the prophets: but the recent events, of which they had been eye-witnesses, and the astonishing interposition of the God of armies in behalf of this chosen city, impressed them with a far more lively sense of these things, than they ever before had attained to. They were also encouraged, by this instance of the Lord's faithful and powerful protection, confidently to expect that he would establish Jerusalem in safety and prosperity through all generations.—As a prophecy, this must mean that city of the living God, of which Jerusalem was but a type: (Notes, Gal. iv. 21—31. Heb. xii. 22—25. Rev. xxi.) for Jerusalem was repeatedly taken, and at length it was given up to be “trodden under foot by the gentiles;” but the church of Christ is founded on a Rock, and God will certainly establish it for ever and ever. (Notes, cxxv. 1, 2. Matt. xvi. 18.)

V. 9. ‘We have waited in silent contemplation and patient hope, for thy loving kindness, with sacrifices and believing prayers, presented at thy temple; trusting in thy aid, and not in our own power or valour.’—This was the conduct of Hezekiah, amidst the menaces and blasphemies of Rabshakeh and Sennacherib. (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 17—37. xix. 2 Chr. xxxii. 1—22.) Yet the conduct of Jehoshaphat and his subjects seems more exactly to accord to these words, than even that of Hezekiah. (Notes, Chr. xx. 1—30.)

V. 10. The “name” of God may, in this connexion, so is thy praise unto the ends of the earth: ^b thy right hand is full of righteousness.

11 Let mount Zion rejoice, let ^c the daughters of Judah be glad, ^d because of thy judgments.

either mean the glorious perfections by which he was known to his people, and distinguished from all the idols of the heathen; or his title, as “the LORD of hosts,” “the God of Abraham, and the God of Israel.” (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, Ex. iii. 14, 15. xxxiv. 5—7.)—In both respects, the powerful protection afforded his people, and the righteous vengeance executed by his right hand on their insolent and impious invaders, would tend to make his praises celebrated, through the whole land, and indeed to the ends of the earth. (Note, 2 Kings xix. 14—19. v. 19.)

V. 11. This verse is in the future tense, and may literally be rendered, “Mount Zion will rejoice and the daughters of Judah,” (the other towns and cities dependent on Jerusalem,) “will be glad because of thy judgments;” as an anticipation, during the apparent danger, of victory and exulting praises, rather than as a subsequent exhortation. (Notes, 2 Chr. xx. 12—25.)

V. 12, 13. The people are here called on, to go round the city in solemn procession; and, while they joyfully praised and blessed the Lord, to mark all the towers, walls, and palaces; observing that not one of them had been in the least injured by their formidable invaders. This would tend the more deeply to impress their minds; and prepare them faithfully and diligently to preserve the memory of these interesting events, for the benefit of future generations. This exact survey of Jerusalem's walls and fortifications, to be transmitted to posterity, might also intimate, that they were typical of more permanent privileges; and they would after a time be demolished, that the things signified by them might remain for ever. (Note, Heb. xii. 26—29.)

V. 14. This verse, as the conclusion of a psalm, in which temporal deliverances, security, and privileges might appear to be exclusively celebrated, is a strong intimation, that spiritual and eternal blessings were also meant. It was before said, that God would establish Jerusalem for ever: but it is here added, in the most emphatical language imaginable, “This God,” who protects Jerusalem, “is our God,” or the Friend and Patron of his true people; and that “for ever and ever,” or “to all eternity:” “He will be our Guide unto death;” through all the sorrows and dangers of this world to the eternal blessings of heaven. (Notes, xxiii. 1—4. lxxiii. 23—28. Heb. xi. 13—16.)

PSALM XLIX.

The Psalmist calls on all mankind to attend to his instructions, 1—4. He shews that the righteous have no cause to fear in evil times, 5. He exposes the vanity of trusting in riches, 6—13. He contrasts the condition of the prosperous ungodly man, with that of the believer, especially in respect of death and the resurrection, 14—20.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord is a great and glorious King, and worthy of universal and most exalted praises: but none on earth will render him this due honour, except the citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, who worship him in the mountain of his holiness, as their God and Saviour. (Notes and P. O. Gal. iv. 21—31.) The beauty and glory of his church, which should be, and will eventually prove, “the joy of the whole earth,” are derived from his presence and love, and are the reflection of his uncreated excellences. Wherever there are princes or people who make God their Refuge, he will be known among them as such: for he will never disappoint the expectation of any who hope in his word. But, when kings and nations, however numerous and potent, confederate against his church, sudden terror and destruction will be their portion. We have heard and read of the works of God for Israel of old; and in the establishment of the gospel upon the ruins of idolatry: and if we wait for his loving-kindness in his holy temple, by persevering faith and prayer, we shall experience, in our measure, the same powerful supports and deliverances; and still more glorious things shall at length be accomplished, in order to establish Christianity throughout the whole earth.—The Lord will always act in perfect consistency with those glorious perfections, which, by means of his word, are made known and celebrated to the ends of the earth: the salvation of his people will be accompanied with righteous vengeance on his enemies; but every true believer may rejoice because of his judgments. Let us then diligently examine, and accurately mark, the security of the everlasting covenant, confirmed by the word and oath of the immutable God: let us consider that “his church is built upon a rock, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail;” and let us meditate upon his exceedingly great and precious promises, and the privileges enjoyed by every true believer. While we are thus encouraged by them to trust and serve the Lord, in perilous and difficult circumstances; let us point them out to our children, and to the rising generation: for this almighty and gracious God is the Portion and the Shield of every true Christian, through successive generations and to all eternity. He will guide us all, through life to death, and through death to glory; and in the city of our God above, we shall enjoy uninterrupted and unalloyed peace and felicity.

NOTES.

PSALM XLIX. Title. The author of this psalm is not known. ‘But whosoever composed it, ... it is likely that he had in his eye, the unreasonable thirst of mankind after riches, and their insolence and haughtiness, when they have acquired them; which, it is possible, was a great discouragement to some pious but poor people in those times: and therefore ... he indited this psalm to check that vanity, by setting death before their eyes.’ Bp. Patrick.—It is not improbable that David wrote the psalm, and gave it to the sons of Korah; though the title may mean, as many think, that it was written by some of the sons of Korah. (Note, xlvii. title.)

V. 1—4. The Psalmist, in these verses, sublimely introduced his subject, by demanding an audience, from the whole human race, to a message which he would deliver unto them from God: and his important and universally interesting instruction, being written in the sacred scriptures, has already been proposed to innumerable multitudes, and will at length be heard by all the inhabitants of the earth, whether of noble or ignoble birth, whether rich or poor. (Notes, 1. 4—6. lxxviii. 2. Deut. xxxii. 1, 2. Matt. xiii. 34, 35.) As the prophet of God, he had first inclined his ear to his divine instructor: and finding the subject difficult, (because of the corrupt prejudices, aversion, and ineptitude of the mind of man to spiritual things,) and to require the closest attention, in order to a right understanding and explanation of it; he had carefully meditated on it before he spoke: and then he had formed it into poetry, and set it to musick; that sacred melody might be the vehicle of weighty instruction. (Marg. Ref.)

All ye people. (1) עַמִּים (plural): including all nations inhabiting the whole earth, as well as Israel.—Both low and high. (2) בְּנֵי אָדָם בְּנֵי אִשׁ. V. 5. The old translation seems to give the true sense of this verse: “Wherefore should I fear in the evil days, when iniquity shall compass me about, as at mine heels.” ‘What cause is there, that I should be troubled with fears, and cares, and anxiety of mind, in calamitous times, when the iniquity of those who endeavour to supplant me hath surrounded me on all sides, and left me no way

‘to escape them?’ Bp. Patrick. In the judgment of the best criticks, among whom is Bishop Lowth, the word, rendered as a substantive “my heels,” is a participle signifying “my supplanters.” ‘The purport of the question is ‘plainly this—Why should I give way to fear and despondency, in the time of calamity, when the wickedness of ‘my wealthy and powerful adversaries compasses me about, ‘to supplant and overthrow me?’ Bp. Horne.—When the consequences of a man’s sins overtake him, and he has no way to escape, he may well fear: but the believer has no occasion to fear the power or subtlety of his most malicious persecutors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. (Notes, lli. 6, 7. lxii. 8—10. Job xxxi. 24—28. Jer. ix. 23, 24. Mark x. 17—31. v. 24. 1 Tim. vi. 17—19.)—A ransom. (7) That is, an atonement, or expiation: for this is the literal meaning of the word (פָּדוּת). (Note, 1 Pet. i. 17—21.) Those, who glory and trust most in their riches, cannot with all their wealth satisfy divine justice, so as to ransom their nearest relative or best beloved friend from death, to which he is sentenced by the righteous Governor of the world: much less can they deliver his soul from hell. (Note, Matt. xvi. 24—28. P. O. 21—28.)

V. 8. Precious.] ‘Rare, or not to be found, as prophecy was precious in the days of Eli, 1 Sam. iii. 1.’ The price of redemption, whether of the life or soul, was too high for any mere man to pay: so that the ancient fathers referred the verse to Christ, in this sense, ‘No man can ‘redeem his brother, he alone excepted, who is also God.’ (Marg. Ref.)—Even a Jewish interpreter ‘understands ‘these words of the King Messiah, who, having died for ‘the redemption of his brethren, afterwards liveth for ‘ever, as was predicted by Isaiah, Is. liii. 10.’ Bossuet, quoted by Bp. Horne.

V. 9. ‘As long as the world endureth this will be a ‘vain endeavour.—Let him attempt it, if he please, upon ‘himself. Can he prolong his own life, ... that it shall be ‘perpetuated and never dissolved?’ Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Prov. x. 2, 3. Ec. viii. 8. Luke xvi. 22, 23.) And if even this be a vain attempt, who can redeem or save his own immortal soul from the awful sentence of eternal punishment?—See corruption.] Note, xvi. 8—11.

V. 10. Every man may see, that the wise and learned of the world die, in the same manner as the foolish and stupid: and those, who have prospered in heaping up wealth, leave it all behind; perhaps to those for whom they never intended it, and who rejoice at their death. (Notes, xcii. 6, 7. Ec. ii. 12—23. v. 13—17. ix. 1—3. Luke xii. 15—21.)

V. 11. ‘Various are the contrivances of vain men, to ‘have their names written on earth, and to procure, after ‘death, an imaginary immortality for themselves and their ‘families, in the memory and conversation of posterity; ‘which is not often obtained, and if obtained is of no ‘value: when with less trouble, they might have secured ‘to themselves a blessed immortality in the kingdom of ‘their Redeemer.’ Bp. Horne. (Notes, Gen. iv. 16, 17. xi. 1—4. 1 Sam. xv. 12. 2 Sam. xviii. 17, 18.)

V. 12. The word (לָיַל) rendered “abideth,” signifies to lodge all night. Man’s continuance in the world, or in honour and distinction, resembles a traveller’s lodging at an inn, whence he removes in the morning; or is even still more precarious and transient. So soon must wealth and honour be relinquished, and the most honourable men die like the beasts that perish; except as distinguished by an immortal soul, and a future state of righteous retribution. (Notes, 20. lxxiii. 18—22. Ec. iii. 18—21. ix. 4—6. Heb. ix. 27, 28.)

V. 13. Some render the first clause, ‘This their way is ‘their confidence,’ meaning a rash and presumptuous confidence. ‘So close does this folly stick to mankind, that ‘they that succeed in their possessions make no benefit of ‘this observation; but are as very fools as themselves, and ‘tread in the steps of those that went before them.’ Bp. Patrick. Indeed, ungodly men from age to age, not only copy the example, but imbibe the principles, and adopt the maxims, of those who went before them in this path, as admired dictates of wisdom. (Notes, Matt. vi. 22, 23. Luke xvi. 14, 15. 1 Cor. iii. 18—23.)

V. 14. The most powerful and prosperous are soon carried into the grave, as sheep into the slaughter-house. There death feeds upon them, in silence and darkness, till “the morning” of the resurrection: then the upright, even poor oppressed believers will have the dominion over their haughtiest persecutors. The grave will consume all the power, glory, and beauty of the wicked, which they possessed in their splendid earthly habitations; and meanness, deformity, and contempt will be their portion: while “the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.” The word, repeatedly translated the grave, is often rendered hell, and probably means the unseen state, whether of body or soul. (Note, xvi. 8—11.) —“Christ’s coming is as the morning, when the elect shall ‘reign, with Christ their Head, over the wicked.’ Then all the beauty, splendour, and external decorations, which the most admired of the ungodly and affluent displayed in their palaces, will appear withered and gone; and they will be in all respects loathsome and contemptible. (Notes, 1 Cor. xv. 39—54. Phil. iii. 20, 21. 1 Thes. iv. 13—18. P. O. Mal. iii. close.)

^k xxxi. 5. ^{lv}. 3. 15 But ^k God will redeem my soul from the ^{*} power of [†] the grave: for he [†] shall receive me. Selah.

V. 15. When the believer dies, his soul, redeemed by the Saviour’s blood, is received by him to glory; the life of his body shall also be restored; it shall be redeemed from the power of the grave, refined, and rendered incorruptible, and glorious. The Psalmist in this verse expresses a full confidence, both that his soul would be preserved from hell, and his body raised from the grave; being received by the Lord to be for ever with him. (Notes, xxxi. 5. lxxiii. 23—28. Luke xxiii. 39—43, John xiv. 2, 3. Acts vii. 54—60. 2 Tim. i. 11, 12.) If this be left out, or indeed not distinctly and fully taken into the account, what does the solemn exordium of the psalm introduce? (Note, 1—4.) For no other important distinction between the righteous and the wicked, in respect of happiness, is mentioned, or even intimated.

V. 16, 17. ‘Be thou not troubled, nor dismayed, ... whosoever thou art that hearest or readest this, when thou ‘seest a worldly man grow very rich, and great honours ‘heaped on his family; which enables and emboldens him ‘perhaps to use the meaner sort contemptuously.’ Bp. Patrick. (Notes, xxxvii. 1—9. lxxiii. 2—14.) When he dies, ‘nothing shall attend him, but his shroud to the ‘grave, and his works to the judgment-seat. View him ‘in this light, which is the proper light to view him in, and ‘he will cease to be the object of fear or envy.’ Bp. Horne. (Note, 1 Tim. vi. 6—10.)—Worldly men count wealth and magnificence their glory: (Gen. xxxi. 1:) but holiness, being the moral image of God, is the true glory of our rational nature; and this will accompany us to heaven.

V. 18. Prosperous sinners count themselves happy, and promise themselves much enjoyment for many years to come; and such is mankind, that those who succeed in ambitious or covetous pursuits, or who live in luxury and splendour, will be sure to find foolish and selfish admirers

18 Though [‡] while he lived he [‡] blessed his soul: and men ^r will praise thee, when thou doest well to thyself.

V. 19. “The soul shall go, &c.” (Marg.) Death will convey one generation after another from the light of this world; and how awful are the words, “They shall not see ‘light for ever!’” (Notes, 2 Pet. ii. 17. Jude 11—13.) This fully proves, that the Psalmist was assured, the righteous would “see light” after death, and for ever. (Note, xxxvi. 5—9.)

V. 20. He who in prosperity has no understanding to use the gifts of God to his glory, but abuses them in wickedness, willingly renounces the grand distinction between a rational creature, and the beasts that perish. As to this world, he gratifies his appetites and inclinations, and dies, as they do: but “after death is the judgment.” (Note, 12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The important truths, which relate to the eternal state of the righteous and the wicked, are equally interesting to all the inhabitants of the earth, “both high and low, rich “and poor, together.” Blessed be God, they are plainly proposed to us in his holy word; and had it not been for man’s dislike to such subjects, they would have been universally heard and understood.—‘At the call of folly, what ‘multitudes are always ready to assemble! But Wisdom, ‘eternal and essential Wisdom, crieth without; she lifteth ‘up her voice in the streets; and who is at leisure to attend her heavenly lectures? The “mouth” of Jesus ‘always “spake of wisdom;” but few regarded him: the ‘“meditation of his heart” was ever “of understanding;” ‘but it was accounted madness.’ Bp. Horne.—We should, however, still endeavour to illustrate and enforce these important instructions, by every method which can soften prejudice, or gain attention: especially by shewing their influence on our own hearts, in mortifying covetousness, ambition, envy, and discontent, and all selfish and sensual passions; in raising us above the fear of man, and rendering us constant and cheerful in doing the will and professing the truth of God, amidst the successful enmity of persecutors or oppressors.—How general, yet how absurd and infatuated, is it, for men to boast of their riches, and trust in them! to pursue them as the one thing needful, if they have a prospect of acquiring them; and to repine and murmur, if they have not! Yet it is most evident, that wealth can neither prolong the life, nor save the soul, of the possessor, or of his most beloved relative: and had not the ransom of the death of Christ intervened, the body

PSALM L.

The mighty God comes in awful majesty from Zion, to judge his people, in the sight of the assembled world, 1—4. He commands that the saints be gathered to him; and declares that the heavens shall declare his righteousness, 5, 6. He delights not in legal sacrifices, but in spiritual worship, 7—15. Hypocrites are rebuked and silenced, 16—21. The ungodly are solemnly warned, and salvation is promised to the upright, 22, 23.

of every sinner must have finally been left in the grave, and his soul in hell; for “the redemption was too precious” to be otherwise effected, and “must have been let alone for ever.” And as we see that neither wealth nor worldly wisdom will exempt any man from dying; and that all such acquisitions must shortly be relinquished for ever; how vain are all our anxious cares and labours! What good will it do any man, to have his name perpetuated on earth, when he has no name in the registers of heaven? Thus foolish are the thoughts and ways of ungodly men. Yet one generation after another applauds their maxims: and the character of a fool, as drawn by heavenly wisdom itself, continues the favourite model for imitation, in the judgment of a vast majority even of professed Christians! (Note, Luke xii. 15—21.) Death alone can convince men in general of the folly of laying up treasures upon earth: and were there no future state, the most wealthy and honourable would soon be leveled with the beasts that perish: but in the prospect of the resurrection and of eternity, the most prosperous of the wicked are infinitely more wretched and base. In this light, let the believer view the riches and the children of this world, that he may not be tempted to envy or impatience, or to fear evil consequences to himself and to the church of God, when sinners grow rich and honourable. Soon will they die, and carry nothing away with them of all their splendour and magnificence. Though they foolishly congratulate themselves, and others applaud them, as having done well for themselves; yet they are going to “the generation of their fathers, and shall never see light;” for to them “is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.” But the real Christian, when he dies, is for ever delivered from sin and sorrow; his soul is received to glory; his body shall be redeemed from the grave, and raised incorruptible and glorious. His inheritance is in heaven; and in the resurrection, he will sit in judgment on those who here oppressed and persecuted him. (Notes, 1 Cor. vi. 1—6. Rev. iii. 20—22.) And is there a rational creature, who can prefer the lot of the rich sinner to that of poor Lazarus? (Notes, Luke xvi. 19—31.) yet is not this more than brutish stupidity universal to the human race, if left to themselves? What need then have we of revelation and of the teaching of the Holy Spirit; when, with all our boasted powers, we are prone to such infatuation, in the most important of all concerns! O Lord, deliver us from the love of the world, and teach us to set our affections on things above! (Note, Col. iii. 1—4.)

“vites to sing praise unto the LORD with the words of “David, and of Asaph the seer.” (2 Chr. xxix. 30.) Hence it appears that Asaph was a prophet, and wrote some Psalms, and probably this among the rest. Some expositors, however, are of opinion, that “Asaph the seer” was a different person from Asaph the Levite, who was one of the chief singers in the days of David; (Marg. Ref.) that he lived at a later period; and that it is not unlikely he was contemporary with Hezekiah, and referred in this Psalm to the hypocrisy of the Jews in general, even during Hezekiah’s reformation.—But, at whatever time the Psalm was composed, the instructions contained in it are of general importance and utility. It is a most sublime poem; and is generally supposed to predict the coming of Christ, the abolition of the Mosaic dispensation, and the introduction of Christianity; with the condemnation of the Jews, especially of the Scribes and Pharisees, for rejecting it. But the judgment executed upon Jerusalem prefigured the awful proceedings and consequences of the general judgment: and the Scribes and Pharisees may be considered as the parents of a numerous progeny of superstitious, formal, and hypocritical professors and teachers of Christianity, who will be condemned at that solemn day.

V. 1, 2. In the preceding Psalm all the inhabitants of the world were addressed in the name of God: (Note, xlix. 1—4;) but here the mighty God (or “the God of gods,” Note, Josh. xxii. 21—29;) JEHOVAH himself, is introduced with inexpressible solemnity; and all the inhabitants of the earth, as well as his people Israel, are summoned to attend. His august tribunal, however, is not placed on mount Sinai, whence he delivered his fiery law; but on mount Zion, where his glory was manifested above the mercy-seat and the ark of the covenant, which prefigured his gracious gospel. Accordingly, Zion is here called “the perfection of beauty:” as reflecting the uncreated glory and excellency of JEHOVAH, who thence shines forth in the perfect harmony of all his divine attributes.—Indeed, the words “perfection of beauty” may be referred to God himself; who appears in the gospel, at once infinitely glorious and infinitely lovely. (Notes, xxvii. 4—6. xc. 13—17. Cant. v. 10—16. Zech. ix. 17. 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18. iv. 5, 6.)—Shined. (2) Marg. Ref. g.

longer keep silence, but would come to execute vengeance on the guilty: and though his tribunal would be placed in Zion; yet his coming would be attended with those terrible displays of majesty, justice, and holiness, with which the law was given from mount Sinai. (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, Ex. xix. 16—20. Deut. v. 22—27. Heb. xii. 18—21.) Thus when Christ came among the Jews, though in the character of a Saviour, they could not “abide the day of his coming;” and his righteous indignation, like unquenchable fire, burnt up the chaff; that is, he destroyed by awful judgments the bulk of the nation, which persisted in rejecting him. (Notes, Mal. iii. 1—6. iv. 1. Matt. iii. 7—12.) But his second coming to judge the world, to perfect the salvation of his people, and to punish the wicked, will be attended with still more tremendous displays of his power and justice, especially against such as neglect, oppose, or pervert and corrupt his gospel.—‘The Jewish rabbies affirm the subject of this Psalm to be, that judgment which will be executed in the days of Messiah:—‘ignorant, alas! that they themselves, and their people, are now become the unhappy objects of that judgment.’

Bp. Horne.

V. 4—6. All the inhabitants of heaven, as well as of earth, shall be summoned to witness the proceedings of their omnipotent Sovereign; and they will all concur in declaring, that his decisions are perfectly wise and righteous.—The whole human race indeed must appear in judgment: yet the professed worshippers of God, who have his oracles and ordinances among them, are chiefly spoken of, in all the descriptions given us in Scripture of that solemn season; because these descriptions were especially given for their instruction, warning, or encouragement. (Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—46. Rom. ii. 7—16. 1 Cor. iv. 3—5. 2 Cor. v. 9—12. 2 Thes. i. 5—10. Rev. xx. 11—15.)—The “saints” may mean those who are really such, and who are interested in the new covenant, through the sacrifice of the great Redeemer. These were separated from among the unbelieving Jews, before vengeance was executed on the nation: and they will be gathered together by the holy angels, previously to the condemnation of the wicked at the last judgment.—(Marg. Ref. o, p.) But some think that professed saints are meant, many of whom trusted to the national covenant with Israel, through the appointed sacrifices, and would at length be convicted of substituting a form, instead of the power of godliness.—As “the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son;” it must be sufficiently manifest, who it is, of whom it is said, “For God is judge himself,” even Emmanuel, the second person in the sacred Trinity, “God manifest in the flesh.” (Notes, li. 16, 17. xcvi. 11—13. John v. 20—27.)

V. 7—15. The Israelites in general confided, and gloried, in their relation to JEHOVAH as their God. And indeed they were peculiarly favoured by him, and were bound by every tie to worship and serve him only, and to expect their whole happiness from him. But this external profession, when insincere, could not secure them from his wrath: nay, “God, even their God,” would speak and testify against them. They were also prone to place their chief dependence on legal sacrifices, without attending to their typical import, or offering them in a proper frame of mind: thus they mistook the shadow for the substance, and at length were condemned for that perverse mistake, when they persisted in rejecting the Messiah: for these sacrifices, when thus offered in unbelief, pride, and hypocrisy, were abominable to God. (*Notes, Prov. xv. 8, 9. Is. i. 10—15. lviii. 1—7. lxvi. 3, 4. Jer. vii. 1—7. 21—23. Am. v. 21—24. Rom. ii. 17—29. would not be about the omission of sacrifices, except as that arose from perverseness and rebellion. The time was approaching, when he would take no bullock or he-goat from them, requiring none but spiritual sacrifices. They could not surely be so gross as to suppose, that he wanted their cattle, seeing he was the sole Proprietor of all things: or imagine that he would “eat the flesh of bulls, “or drink the blood of goats!” Such sacrifices therefore could not be acceptable to him, except as expressions of repentance, faith, and love. On the other hand a humble, thankful heart, disposed to worship and praise God, (to “sacrifice unto God thanksgiving,” Note, Heb. xiii. 15, 16;) and to fulfil the engagements implied in the profession of being his people, as well as the vows made in the days of distress; and to confide in him and seek help from him in trouble, by earnest prayer, were sacrifices suited to his holy nature. This spiritual worship, springing from a penitent believing heart, and connected with humble submission and obedience, was the grand substance of true religion, even under the Mosaick dispensation; and would be the substance of that which was about to succeed: and worshippers of this character would be accepted and delivered, and would render glory and praise to God for temporal mercies, and eternal salvation. (Marg. Ref. i—n.)—This passage was evidently intended as an intimation, that the ceremonial law would be abrogated at the coming of the Messiah; as well as an encouragement to prayer and praise.

V. 16—21. Multitudes of the strictest professors and teachers of the Jewish church were, not only superstitious and formal, (and so either blind guides or blindly led,) but even atrociously wicked; and yet they cloaked their crimes with apparent zeal. (Notes, Matt. xxiii. 14—33.) Thus in all ages many love the credit of being called Christians, and the dignity of instructors, who “hate instruction;” and many discourse on the word of God with their lips, who pour contempt upon it in their lives. While they zealously plead for some parts of divine truth, they secretly, nay, perhaps openly, indulge themselves in lewdness, dishonesty, and in wicked and deceitful conversation, and the basest slander and calumny; especially against those who are strictly conscientious, and such pious persons as, being near to them, put them to shame by their example.

Indeed, in this manner they often excuse their crimes, and even think they have compensated for them, by their earnestness in promoting what they suppose to be the cause of God. But the righteous Judge disdains such hypocrites, and abhors their religious profession and preaching, even more than their theft, adultery, and lies; because they tend more to disgrace the gospel, and to prejudice or deceive the souls of men. “What have they to do to declare “his statutes, or to take his covenant in their mouths?” His cause needs not such helpers; he never sent nor employed them; and they must expect his vengeance as their recompence. Such were the scribes and chief priests, who were scrupulously zealous about externals, while they were full of rapine and covetousness; and were seeking to murder the holy Jesus, by bearing false witness against him before Pilate, in the most atrocious manner. The whole of this strange delusion arises from a perverse construction, put upon the long-suffering of God: (Notes, Ec. viii. 11—13. Rom. ii. 4—6;) and a wilful mistake of his character and the intention of his gospel: as if the methods of his grace, the doctrines of his word, or the ordinances of his worship, were substituted in the stead of a holy life, and afforded men the licence to indulge their lusts with impunity! But the Jews of old were reprov'd, convicted, condemned, and punished with the most dreadful severity, on these accounts: and so will all the superstitious, formal, hypocritical, enthusiastick, or antinomian abusers of the gospel; when the day of judgment shall come, and the secrets of men shall be judged by Jesus Christ.—Consentedst, &c. (18) Or, “Hadst pleasure in him.” (Note, Rom. i. 28—32, conclusion.) Kept silence. (21) Note, 3.

V. 22, 23. The Psalmist in conclusion warns all of every description, “who forget God,” (which is the cause of every fatal error and daring crime,) to consider the account which they must give, and to “flee from the wrath “to come;” for when the Almighty should appear as their enemy, no deliverer could possibly be found. He also encourages the upright to offer their humble tribute of grateful praise; with which God will be glorified, through the promised Redeemer, notwithstanding their deficiencies: (Notes, Col. iii. 16, 17. 1 Pet. ii. 4—6, conclusion;) and in a circumspect and conscientious conversation, to wait for a fuller discovery and experience of God's salvation; or, as

PSALM LI.

David earnestly prays for mercy, humbly confesses his sins, and laments his original depravity, 1—6. He intreats forgiveness, sanctification, and renewed com-

the last clause may be understood, to look for the coming of their promised Saviour. (Notes, 7—15. xxiv. 3—6.)—According to the concluding words of these verses, no man “ordereth his conversation,” or conduct, “aright,” who trusts in his own works, and does not seek “the salvation of God;” none seeks that salvation properly, who is not conscientious in his whole conduct; and none, who unites the two, fails of salvation.—The Latin version of Beza is very striking: ‘Qui componit viam, faciam ut is fruatur salute Dei.’ ‘Him, who disposes,’ or regulates, ‘his conduct, I will cause to enjoy the salvation of God.’ The preventing grace of God leads a man, like Cornelius, to regulate his conduct piously and uprightly, and to wait for God’s salvation in this way; and the promise ensures to such a person the enjoyment of that salvation. (Notes, Acts x. 1—8. 34, 35.)—What a noble view does this psalm give of God and of Revelation! God stands forth as the Parent, the Lord, and the Judge of all, and the Saviour of all who trust in him; exercising a universal providence, soliciting us to make him our Refuge, to worship and serve him, promising us his reward and favour.—And in the Old Testament itself which enjoins so many ceremonies, how little intrinsick value is there ascribed to them, compared with spiritual worship and ordering the conversation aright!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

The almighty and eternal JEHOVAH has spoken to men from mount Sinai as a Lawgiver, and from mount Zion as a Saviour: and ere long he will speak to the whole human race from his righteous tribunal. This solemn season will be to sinners “the day of wrath, and revelation of the “righteous judgment of God,” while heaven and earth will approve the sentence denounced against them. But those who have been favoured with the blessed gospel, in which the beauty and glory of all the divine perfections shine forth in the face of Jesus Christ, and who have neglected or abused it, will hear the most tremendous doom. Happy are they, who are saints indeed! who have acceded to the covenant of grace by faith in the Redeemer’s atoning sacrifice, and who have shewn the sincerity of their love by the fruits of righteousness! These shall first be severed from among the wicked, and announced heirs of eternal life.—But let us beware of resting in any form: even divine truths and institutions may be held and attended on in unrighteousness; and God will testify against his own professed people, who trust to their outward privileges, and frequent his sacraments in pride, superstition, or self-righteousness. He demands the heart, and will not be put off with an unmeaning external observance: how then can human inventions please him, when repentance, faith, and holiness are neglected?—We cannot offer unto God any thing, which he has not bestowed upon us, nor any thing which can profit him: so that the notion of meriting from him is replete with ignorance, as well as arrogance. (Note and P. O. 1 Chr. xxix. 10—19.) As the Jews and their costly oblations were abhorred, when fort, that he may glorify God and promote the conversion of sinners, 7—15. He shews, that God delights more in a contrite heart, than in legal sacrifices, 16, 17. He prays for the prosperity of the church, 18, 19.

they rejected him, of whom Moses and their prophets had written; so will attendance on the ordinances of Christianity be rejected, and even moral obedience itself, if substituted in his place: and no spiritual services can be performed, except by faith in him, and by the supply of his Spirit. To be sensible of our own indigence, dependence, and unworthiness; to seek every thing from the all-sufficient God by faith and prayer; to render him the tribute of a thankful heart; to perform the vows implied in baptism and the Lord’s supper; (Note, lvi. 12. P. O. end;) and to call upon him in every time of trouble, as our only Refuge and Friend; are reasonable sacrifices, and suited to him, who “is a Spirit, and seeketh such to worship him, as “worship him in spirit and truth.” (Note, John iv. 21—24.) Those, who thus worship, “glorify God:” and every answer to prayer, received with gratitude, forms an earnest of their eternal salvation.

V. 16—22.

If ignorant formalists, though not grossly immoral or profane, are under a dangerous delusion, what will be the doom of those, who understand, profess, and preach the truths of God; attend on, and even administer, his ordinances, and speak of his everlasting covenant; while they hate instruction, despise his commandments, and are companions with thieves, adulterers, liars, slanderers, and false swearers? Yet how many such professors and teachers of Christianity disgrace the present age! How many such scandals are found even among those, who are zealous for the doctrines of grace! nay even among popular and admired preachers. And how strangely are they connived at, and enabled to keep up their confidence, as if the Judge of the world were altogether such a one as themselves! Indeed their present impunity emboldens them to expect, that they shall always escape. But the Judge will come, and will strip off their masks, and reprove, convict, and condemn them. He will “set in order” before them, and publish to the world, what they have done; he will say to each of them, ‘See what thou hast wrought!’ while the pages which record their crimes shall be read to their confusion; and they will be speechless, when sentenced to “depart into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and “his angels.” Let us then judge ourselves, and beware of hypocrisy: let ministers see to it, that they preach first to themselves, and love and practise their own instructions: let every one enquire, whether he be indeed “allowed of God “to be put in trust with the gospel;” or whether he run without being sent. It is evident beyond all doubt, that God abhorreth and will never allow of those, who presume to declare his truths, while they are living in the love and habitual practice of gross sin, and take pleasure in those who do; and then slander and revile their more pious brethren, because not of their party, and because their example puts them to shame. If any have hitherto been thus forgetful of God, or given up to wickedness, let them consider their urgent danger: for if the Judge appear against them, who then can rescue them from his almighty indignation? He now warns, that he may not punish: let

NOTES

PSALM LI. Title. (Notes, 2 Sam. xi, xii. 1—12.) When Nathan had delivered his message, we may suppose that David retired to his chamber full of confusion, remorse, and anguish; and there poured forth his soul before God in unreserved confessions and fervent prayers. And considering his rank, his age, and a variety of circumstances relating to his family, to persons disaffected to his government, and to his character among the surrounding nations; it might have been thought expedient for him to be satisfied with these secret acts of contrition and devotion, with humbling himself before God by fasting and prayer, and with “bringing forth fruits meet for repentance:” especially as God had already remitted the sentence of temporal death, to which the law condemned him. (Note, 2 Sam. xii. 13.) But he viewed the subject in another light, when brought to reflect seriously on his conduct, and its probable consequences. The honour of God and of true religion was deeply concerned, and with it the best interests of very great multitudes: nor did there appear any other way, in which the bad effects of his crimes could be so thoroughly prevented, as by his publicly taking the deepest shame to himself, for having acted directly contrary to that holy religion which he professed. Zeal for the glory of God and love to his people having now revived, and gained the ascendancy in his heart, united with deep self-abhorrence, and a kind of indignation against himself; he seems to have resolved without delay, whatever might be the consequences to himself and his reputation, to publish to his family, his subjects, the world at large, and all future generations, the judgment which he now entertained of his late behaviour, in the substance of his secret confessions and supplications; and the way in which, with deep anguish and distress, he sought forgiveness and salvation. —He therefore not only composed this psalm for his private use, or to shew his friends, or leave among his writings; but he gave it to “the chief musician,” that it might form a part of the publick Psalmody at the tabernacle, and in consequence be circulated through all the land, and among other nations; and continue in the church, with his other sacred poems, for the instruction and warning of mankind in all future ages. Nothing, all circumstances considered, can be conceived more humiliating than such a measure; nothing could more decidedly shew how much he preferred the honour of God to his own credit; in short, nothing could more decidedly manifest the depth of genuine repentance. (Note, 1 Sam. xv. 30, 31.)

V. 1, 2. The “mercy” of God, his “loving-kindness,” his “tender mercies,” “the multitude of his tender mercies,” form the only plea, which the royal penitent admits in seeking forgiveness of his heinous crimes. He does not once mention his former services in the cause of religion; or palliate his conduct, by the peculiar temptations of his high rank, and the customs of princes; or plead that he was inadvertently betrayed into it, and led on by imperceptible degrees, step by step: (Notes, 1 Sam. xv. 15. 24, 25. Prov. xxviii. 13. Luke xv. 17—19:) but, as a vile and miserable sinner, with many repetitions and an accumulation of words, energetically expressing his inmost thoughts and feelings, he dwells on the only cheering thought his case allowed of; and intreats, that God would, “to the praise of the glory of his grace,” forgive his sins, as a debt which when remitted is blotted out; (Notes, 9. Is. xliii. 22—25. xlv. 22. Eph. i. 3—8. Col. ii. 13—15;) and, as the stain was beyond expression deep, that he would thoroughly wash and cleanse it all away. (Notes, 7. Is. i. 16—20. Ez. xxxvi. 25—27. Zech. xiii. 1. John xiii. 6—11. 1 Cor. vi. 9—11. Tit. iii. 4—7. Rev. i. 4—6. vii. 13—17.) The language is taken from the washings and purifications of the Mosaic law; and shews that the Psalmist fervently prayed to be cleansed from the pollution, as well as the guilt of his sins; that he was aware no outward forms or endeavours of his own could effect this cleansing; and that he sought this blessing through the redemption and grace of the promised Saviour. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. (Notes, xxxii. 1—5.) While David endeavoured to cover his sins, to conceal or excuse them, he could not, sincerely and heartily, seek forgiveness from God, as an act of unmerited mercy and grace, and even contrary to his deservings. And this seems to have been his state of mind before Nathan came to him: but now “being come to himself,” he is deeply conscious of his most heinous guilt; and confesses it openly and ingenuously, with all its aggravations: nay, the remembrance of his complicated atrocious crimes seems to haunt him continually, and his conscience incessantly reproaches him; so that he can by no means exclude the most distressing reflections. Thus he “submits to the righteousness of God, owns that he deserves to perish, and is prepared, if spared, to ascribe the whole honour of salvation to the rich mercy and grace of God alone. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 12, 13. Job xxxiii. 27—30. Jer. xxxi. 18—20. Luke xv. 17—21. 1 John i. 8—10.)

‘sin. I have sinned against men, but it is thy law that ‘I have violated, in that is my offence.’ Bp. Hall.—‘If ‘thou shouldst pronounce the heaviest sentence upon me ‘for my crimes, and execute it with the greatest severity, ‘I could not accuse thee of too much rigour; but must ‘still justify thee in thy proceedings, and clear thee from ‘all such unjust imputations.’ Bp. Patrick.—David’s crimes had deeply injured Bathsheba, Uriah, Joab and the other accessories to Uriah’s murder, the men slain with him, their families, and the nation; and they were likely to occasion most fatal consequences in various ways to great numbers in different nations, and all succeeding ages. (Notes, 2 Sam. xi. 6—17. xii. 14.) Yet the chief malignity of his conduct consisted in this; that it was a complication of most daring rebellions against the great and glorious Governor of the world; contempt of His majesty, excellency, and righteous law; a most ungrateful return for immense obligations; and an apostasy in heart from God, through idolatrous love of worldly pleasure. (Notes, 2 Sam. xii. 9, 10.) Indeed no words can express the heinousness and aggravations of his guilt when thus weighed: and this view seems to have possessed and overwhelmed his mind to such a degree, as to make every other consideration appear comparatively as nothing. Even before the law was given, God himself stated that the grand malignity of murder consisted in its being an assault on man, whom he created in his own image. (Note, Gen. ix. 5, 6.)—Crimes in civil society, which are injurious to individuals, are yet punished as violations of the laws of the land, done against the king and the peace of the realm: such are called, ‘Pleas ‘of the Crown;’ and high treason is the chief crime in every land. David indeed was not accountable for his conduct to any human tribunal: he had carefully concealed his transgressions from man; but he was sensible that the Lord had witnessed the whole, and would bring it to light. He therefore found himself constrained to plead guilty, to the most humiliating charges of guilt and depravity, brought against mankind in general, which were contained in the word of God; for he was convinced that his base conduct, after all his peculiar advantages and zealous profession of religion, would abundantly justify those declarations of the entire wickedness of the human heart; and fully confute the blasphemous censures, which ungodly men ventured to pass upon the government of God, and upon his denunciations and judgments, as if unjust and severe. Thus, in every sense, the case of David, when well understood, is suited to justify God in all his declarations, and to vindicate his whole government from every aspersion. (Notes, Gen. vi. 5. viii. 20—22. Job xv. 14—16. Rom. iii. 3, 4.)

V. 5, 6. David was the offspring of lawful and honourable marriage; nothing is intimated against his father Jesse in the sacred oracles, and he repeatedly speaks of his mother as “the hand-maid of the Lord:” (Notes, lxxxvi. 16. cxvi. 16:) yet, having received from his parents Adam’s fallen nature with all its evil propensities, he confesses that he was conceived and shapen in iniquity. (Marg. Ref.)—His late dreadful fall evinced the depravity of his heart: and in these instances he had only acted according to its corrupt bias; being in himself naturally prone to rebellion against God. (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, Gen. v. 3. Job xiv. 1—6. xxv. Eph. ii. 3.) This he confessed in deep humiliation; yet it by no means followed, that the Lord should relax in his requirements, because of the depraved propensities of his apostate creatures.—His perfect law requires entire truth, purity, and love in the heart and conduct; and in this alone he delights; and sincerity from the inmost soul, in repentance, faith, and renewed obedience, is requisite even according to the gospel. This the Psalmist had been taught, before his transgressions: “in the hidden part the LORD had made him to know wisdom,” which was a great aggravation of his guilt, in that he sinned against knowledge, conscience, and the peculiar obligations conferred on him. If we read the clause in the future tense, as in our translation, and as it stands in the Hebrew, it expresses the Psalmist’s hope and prayer, that the Lord would, notwithstanding his guilt and depravity, graciously and by his effectual inward teaching, communicate to him true wisdom, and enable him to know and do what he required and delighted in.—‘I am so far from representing ‘this’ (my innate propensity to evil,) ‘as an excuse for ‘what I have done; that I confess the consideration of ‘it ought to have made me the more watchful and diligent, ‘to suppress those bad inclinations, which I knew to be ‘so natural. ... I am amazed at my folly, that I should be ‘so careless; when I was not ignorant that thou requirest ‘us not to entertain, with the least kindness, those first ‘motions which we find in our thoughts and desires after ‘any evil, but uprightly to oppose them.’ Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Jam. i. 13—18.)—Desirest. (6) ^{וְהִשְׁתַּדַּלְתָּ}: delightest in.

V. 7. The hyssop, employed in sprinkling the blood of the sacrifices, (as it is generally thought,) in the offerings of the cleansed leper; and in sprinkling the water of purification; represented the efficacy of faith, in applying to the soul the blood of Christ for pardon, and the influences of the Holy Spirit for sanctification. (Num. xix. 18. —Notes, Ex. xii. 22, 23. xxiv. 6—8. Lev. xiv. 4—7. Ez. xxxvi. 25—27. Heb. ix. 18—23.) Thus David prayed to be completely cleansed from all sin, both as to its guilt and pollution, that he might be as if he had never sinned: and thus believers will at length be made equal to the angels, who are arrayed in spotless robes of innocence, whiter than the snow itself. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Rev. vii. 13—17.)

quisite torture, and be utterly disabled for the present; and probably will be reminded of his fall as long as he lives. Thus David had, through unwatchfulness, been induced to commit the most heinous wickedness: and though, by the abundant mercy of God, he was preserved from that final destruction which he had justly merited; yet he experienced such anguish of conscience, and such a sense of the divine displeasure, and met with such severe rebukes from the Lord, that he felt as if all his bones had been broken: he was full of pain and anguish; he was crippled, and disabled from his former employments. He hoped, however, and prayed that “the God of salvation” would restore his peace and comfort; and thus set his broken bones, and even cause them to rejoice. (Notes, 12, 13. xxxviii. 4—10. Is. lxi. 1—3. Hos. vi. 1—3.)

V. 9. (Note, 1, 2.) ‘The soul, still restless and uneasy, reiterates her request, that God would not only cease to behold her iniquity for the present, as a man who turneth away his face from a writing; but that he would not behold it more, as a man who blotteth out what is written, so that it can never be read again.’ Bp. Horne. (Marg. Ref. e. Note, 1, 2.)

V. 10. The production of a holy disposition in a sinner’s heart,—the forming him to a spiritual judgment and taste, a submissive will, a pure imagination, and well regulated affections,—is a “new creation:” even as if Satan, by almighty power, should again be made a holy angel. This state of the understanding and heart is “a right spirit,” it is reasonable and excellent, such as all intelligent beings should possess, and it is absolutely necessary to true liberty and felicity. Man originally possessed it; but it was lost by the fall: and where it is again produced, it is the “renewal of a right spirit.” This is begun in regeneration, and carried on by progressive sanctification, and completed in glory. When the sinner is deeply convinced that such a change is necessary, and that he is unable to work it in himself; and when he reads the promises of God to this purpose, (Notes, Ez. xi. 17—20. xviii. 30—32. xxxvi. 25—27,) he asks it from God: and every discovery of remaining sinfulness leads the believer to renew this supplication; and thus the change is gradually effected till it be finally completed.—The margin, however, renders it, “Renew a constant (נָכוֹן, established) spirit within me.” Holy angels are established in a right spirit; and so are “the spirits of just men made perfect.” Even on earth real Christians have in a measure, this constant, established spirit: but hypocrites are unstable. David had experienced the inconstancy of his heart; and was sensible, that even if pardoned and restored, he should, in case he were left to himself, be again drawn aside; and he prayed earnestly for that constancy, which might enable him, “with pure pose of heart to cleave unto the Lord.” (Notes, 12, 13.

V. 11. Eternal banishment from the gracious presence of God, under his wrath and curse, constitutes a principal part of the misery of hell: (Note and P. O. Matt. xxv. 41—46:) and something like this misery may be felt on earth, even by the believer, when, excluded from comfortable communion with God, he finds his heart oppressed with the sense or dread of deserved wrath. This heaviest of all afflictions David deprecated.—The Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, when he was rejected from being king, and an evil spirit from God troubled him: (Note, 1 Sam. xvi. 14:) and David feared the same sentence for his more atrocious crimes, as in some respects they certainly were. All his sufficiency, as the prophet of God, as his anointed king, and as the Psalmist of Israel, was derived from the Holy Spirit: and all his comfort and usefulness must terminate, if the Holy Spirit should be finally taken from him. It is indeed maintained, and, as it appears to me, on scriptural ground, that the spirit of life and sanctification is never finally taken from believers: but, even in this case, their comforts may expire in despondings, their credit in disgrace, and all their gifts and usefulness may wither and be lost to the end of life; and they cannot, in such circumstances, distinguish themselves from hypocrites.

V. 12, 13. “The joy of God’s salvation,” arises from a persuasion and perception of the mercy and grace of God, according to his promises; of the nature and glory of his salvation, as revealed in the Scriptures; of its suitableness to the sinner’s wants, its freeness, and sufficiency; from a prevailing confidence of an interest in this mercy; and from communion with God, and the exercise of faith, hope, admiring, adoring, grateful love, and all other holy affections, as springing from the Spirit of sanctification. The raptures and ecstasies peculiar to the prophets were of a very different nature, and arose from the sublime discoveries made to them in dreams or visions, and they did not always imply holiness of heart: whereas “the joy of salvation” is the common privilege of the regenerate, according to the degree of their faith and grace; and it belongs to no one else. (Marg. Ref. k.) This joy David had often experienced, but he had lost it by sin: that loss he deeply and humbly regrets; and he earnestly prays for the restoration of his joy: for it cannot subsist, unless the conscience be kept tender, the heart watchful and spiritual, and the will submissive; and unless communion with God be maintained, and the Holy Spirit not grieved, or quenched by gross misconduct. But the royal penitent likewise feared, that even should he recover this holy joy, he should again lose it, if left to himself; and therefore he earnestly prayed, that God would “uphold him with his free Spirit” The Holy Spirit may be thus called, because he is freely bestowed on sinners through the gracious Saviour: but this epithet seems rather to mean, that the sanctifying Spirit sets the soul at liberty from sin and Satan, produces a noble, ingenuous, and liberal disposition, and teaches us to serve and worship God, as children and not as slaves. (Notes, Rom. viii. 1, 2. 14—17. 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18. Gal. iv. 4—7. 2 Tim. i. 6—8.) Thus comforted and upheld, David purposed yet again to teach sinners the ways of God, of peace, and holiness; and by using his influence for this purpose, and warning and encouraging them by his experience, he trusted that he should lead many to “repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance.” (Notes, xxxii. 6, 7. Mark v. 14—20. Luke xxii. 31—34. 1 John i. 1—4.)

V. 14. The guilt of murder as it were haunted David's mind, and he was still praying for the removal of it from his conscience. And if he might but obtain this blessing from “the God of his salvation,” though dreadful judgments had been denounced against him and his family for his crimes; he yet engaged to be open in vindicating the justice of God in these dispensations, even if connected with his own deep disgrace.—Some expositors indeed explain the words to mean that he would celebrate that righteousness, by which sinners who believe are accounted righteous before God, or the faithfulness of God to his promises: but the former meaning appears to me more satisfactory.

V. 15. Conscious guilt had stopped David's mouth, when he attempted, as formerly, to shew forth the praises of God, or to plead his cause: but he trusted that the comforts of his pardoning love, and the returning influences of his Holy Spirit, would open his mouth, and give him confidence and liberty on these favourite topicks. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. Murder and adultery were by the law punishable by death; and therefore no sacrifices were appointed to be offered by those who were guilty of them. The Lord would not accept, and did not desire, any sacrifices in David's case: indeed he had no delight in sacrifices and burnt-offerings for their own sake; but merely as shadows of the true atonement, and expressions of a penitent, believing, thankful heart. (Notes, xl. 6—8. 1. 7—15.)

V. 17. The legal sacrifices were continued above a thousand years after this time, as types of the Redeemer's atoning sacrifice. Indeed a broken heart can do nothing towards meriting forgiveness. But a humble spirit, broken off from all self-dependence and the love of sin, and crushed down into deep self-abasement and abhorrence, is a spiritual sacrifice pleasing and honourable to God: for he, who is enabled to present this oblation, unreservedly submits to the justice of God; casts himself, without plea or excuse, upon his free mercy; thankfully accepts of his salvation; and will walk according to it, in all humble obedience, and patient submission to the will of God. This broken and contrite spirit man despises, as mean and contemptible; and the possessor is apt to deem it unmeet to be presented to his offended Sovereign: but God will never despise nor reject such an unequivocal effect of his own renewing grace. (Notes, xxxiv. 18. 2 Kings xxii. 15—20. Is. lvii. 15, 16. lxvi. 1, 2. Ez. ix. 3, 4. Matt. v. 3. 2 Cor. vii. 9—11.)

V. 18, 19. David feared lest his guilt should render him as an Achan in the congregation of Israel: (Notes and P. O. Josh. vii. 10—18:) and therefore he concluded his penitential prayer, with intreating God to protect and prosper Zion; that the ordinances of his house might be administered to his glory, and the edification of his people. (Marg. Ref. e. g.) For though the Lord delighted not in burnt-offerings, for their own sake; yet as they were sacramental prefigurations of the Messiah's atonement; as they were acts of worship, and means of grace, and thus subserved the interests of true piety; and as they were accompanied by other sacrifices of righteousness, he was pleased with them. (Marg. Ref. h, i.)—‘Thus it ought to be the fervent prayer of every man, especially...in any exalted station,...that no sins, by him committed, may any way prejudice others, or obstruct the edification of the church.’ Bp. Horne.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

If the most eminent believer ceases to watch and pray, nay, becomes more remiss and formal, than he once was; Satan may at length obtain such advantages against him, that for the time he shall seem perfectly fascinated and stupified: but the Lord will at length, by sharp rebukes, or most painful corrections, bring him to himself; and the depth of his humiliation will be proportioned to the heinousness of his sins. But the hypocrite is durably callous; and his religious profession and opinions are perversely employed, in excusing his crimes, and buoying up his pre-

PSALM LII.

David contrasts the deceit and malice of Doeg, with sumptuous confidence.—The true penitent, even if before his fall he had been eminently holy and useful, has nothing to plead, except his own misery and the Lord's abundant mercy. For the more we are enabled to do in his service, the greater are our obligations: (Note, 1 Chr. xxix. 10—19:) and our sins are the more aggravated, when committed against knowledge, mercies, and vows; when they do violence to the new nature, and the strivings of the Holy Spirit; and when they are inconsistent with our character and profession, and tend to dishonour the gospel, and mislead our brethren.—The real penitent will be deeply humbled and afflicted; but he will not sink into despair: and in proportion as he renounces every false confidence, the more earnestly will he call upon God to "have mercy on him, according to the multitude of his tender mercies." He longs to have the whole debt of his sins cancelled, and every stain cleansed. He would be "thoroughly washed from his iniquities," till all his guilt and defilement be completely removed: but the hypocrite always has some secret reserves, and would spare some favourite lust.—While sinners conceal or palliate their sins, they are out of the way of mercy: but when they humbly and ingenuously plead guilty, and unreservedly confess their crimes; they may even plead that confession, as a reason why they should be spared: for this yields the point in contest; namely, that the Lord might justly punish, and that salvation must be all of grace.—When a load of guilt oppresses a man of a tender conscience; the recollection of his sins, and their aggravations, follows him into company and into retirement; it occurs to his mind in scenes of business and of pleasure, and even breaks his rest, and disquiets his dreams; so that "his sin is ever before him:" but slight convictions, where the heart is not broken, are soon shaken off; and the wound is skinned over, but not healed.—The true penitent considers every sin as rebellion against the authority and infinite Majesty of heaven. Even if he has been preserved from those crimes which evidently injure society, he reflects with shame upon the enmity and ingratitude of his heart against God, which have been manifested in his general conduct; and on this account he thinks himself a chief sinner: but if guilty of grosser transgressions, he considers his rebellion against God in them far more enormous than any injury, which he has done to men like himself. He is also ashamed of the folly of bestowing pains to hide these actions from men, which are done in the sight of his Lord and Judge; he takes the part of God against himself, and pleads guilty to the most humiliating charge in his word, as true in his own case: while those, who excuse themselves, commonly venture to arraign and censure the decisions and proceedings of the Almighty.

V. 5—13.

When the heart is deeply humbled on the recollection of heinous transgressions, the penitent is led to trace back the streams of actual sin to the fountain of original depravity; not to cavil or object, with the infidel or the hypocrite, but for his own deeper humiliation: he com-

the goodness of God, 1—4. He predicts Doeg's ruin, and the joy of the righteous, 5—7. He professes confidence in God, and a full persuasion that he shall praise him for ever, 8, 9.

pares the propensities of his heart as well as his outward conduct, with the holy law and glorious perfections of God; and, perceiving the contrariety, "abhors himself," and repents in dust and ashes." (Note and P. O. Job xlii. 1—6.) When he meditates on that "truth in the inward parts," in which the Lord delights, and that wisdom which he teaches; and considers how contrarily he has often acted to both; he is ashamed of his temper and conduct, and is led the more entirely to expect every thing good, from the sole influence of divine grace overcoming the tendency of corrupt nature. In short, he feels his need of pardon and of holiness; he longs for peace of conscience and purity of heart: and his experience of his own utter inability to obtain them for himself, puts vigour into his prayers to the Lord, to purge him by the blood and Spirit of Christ, "that he may be clean; to wash him "that he may be whiter than snow;" to "cause him to "hear of joy and gladness," that his troubled spirit may rejoice; and, pardoning all his sins, "to create in him "a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within him," by his own almighty power; that for the future he may hate and flee from all sin. He longs for this renewal to holiness as much as for "the joy of salvation;" and to be upheld from falling, equally with "the light of God's "countenance," and the consolations of his Holy Spirit.—Nothing so animates the soul to teach the ways of God to sinners, and to seek for their conversion, as a deep experience of the bitterness of sin, and of the consolations of the pardoning and saving love of God, and the freedom and pleasantness of his service: they therefore always form the most zealous preachers to others, who have themselves been most deeply humbled; and those are most earnest for the salvation of their fellow-sinners, who most value and rejoice in the salvation of God themselves.

V. 14—19.

When the heart is humbled, and the conscience tender, renewed recollection of heinous transgressions again and again discourages the soul: but this excites more fervent prayers; and when mercy is bestowed by "the God of "salvation," such penitents will most abound in thankful praises. Yet conscious guilt stops the mouth, and the humbled sinner is afraid or ashamed to speak of his God, as in times past, until the impediment be removed by some tokens of pardoning love, and the comforts of the Holy Spirit. Such a one would do any thing, or part with any thing, to obtain pardon and peace: (Note, Mic. vi. 6—8:) but human inventions are worthless; and even divine ordinances are no more than means of communicating the blessings, procured by the sacrifice of Christ; and which can only be received by a broken and contrite heart, with which God is well pleased.—No personal fears or troubles of conscience can render the soul of a true Christian forgetful of the interests of the church, or indifferent about them: the humble believer and faithful minister often fear lest their own misconduct should blight their endeavours for doing good: and, whatever they may suffer, or whatever may become of them, they still desire and pray, that true religion may prevail, and that spiritual sacrifices may abound through Jesus Christ, to the praise and glory of God.—O Lord, give us true repentance, for thy mercies' sake; help us to offer the sacrifice of a contrite spirit; preserve us from hypocrisy and blood-guiltiness, especially that of occasioning the ruin of immortal souls by our example or neglect; and enable us through the merits and mediation of thy Son Jesus Christ, to walk with increasing watchfulness, and to pray more fervently for our fellow-Christians and fellow-sinners.

NOTES.

PSALM LII. Title. Notes, 1 Sam. xxii. 6—19.

V. 1. Doeg is here represented as boasting of his successful treachery, and savage cruelty, in murdering a multitude of unarmed and unresisting priests, and of women and children, as if he had performed some great exploit; and perhaps he menaced David and his company with the same vengeance. But the Psalmist, by contrasting Doeg's malice and mischief with the persevering goodness of God, sharply reprov'd him: and, in fact, relying on the faithful and merciful promises of God, he set him and all his other enemies at defiance.

V. 2. Doeg appeared before Ahimelech with the semblance of piety; yet treacherously became his accuser and murderer. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxi. 7.) This unsuspected malice and cruelty were like a mortal blow given with a well-set razor, so as scarcely to be felt, at the moment when given. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. It appears that Doeg not only sought the favour of Saul, but entered cordially into the detestable service required of him. His heart, being enmity against God, hated his priests and servants, because he had a rooted aversion to piety and holiness. He loved evil, lying, and mischief, and gave them a decided preference to goodness, righteousness, and truth: for he took pleasure in gratifying his malignity and impiety, even as others did in gratifying avarice or sensual lusts. Nor was this all: for he loved and preferred in others the same hateful dispositions, in which he indulged himself; and by calumny and lies prepared the way for persecution and murder. Thus he resembled, and was in some respects a type of those who saw and hated the holy Jesus, because they hated the Father that sent him; and accomplished his death by lying witnesses and virulent accusations. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 57—62. John viii. 41—47. xv. 22—25. xvi. 1—3. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12. Jam. iii. 3—6.)

V. 5. An accumulation of most expressive metaphors is here used, to mark the certainty of that dreadful and eternal punishment, which awaited this prosperous and haughty persecutor; and which awaits all who bear the same character, however in other respects distinguished.

V. 6, 7. The righteous, beholding the ruin of this haughty and atrocious transgressor, would reverence the divine justice, become more afraid of sin, and be confirmed in true religion: yea, they would exult in beholding condign vengeance executed upon one, who was become so execrable and terrible by his crimes; and express cordial satisfaction in observing the event of a man's trusting in wealth and prosperity, encouraging himself in wickedness, renouncing God, and setting him at defiance. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lviii. 10, 11. Rev. xviii. 20. xix. 1—6.)

V. 8. The olive-tree produces the oil, which is useful to man, and was employed in the worship of God. (Note, Judg. ix. 8—15, v. 9.) Thus David, being rooted in love to the ordinances of God, would abide and be fruitful in his house; while Doeg, who was “detained before the LORD,” became a firebrand to destroy others and himself. (Notes, xiii. 5, 6. xcii. 12—15. cxlvii. 10, 11. Rom. xi. 16—21.)

I trust in the mercy of God for ever and ever.] “God shall destroy thee for ever (5).” “I will praise thee for ever (9).” (Notes, cxlv. 1, 2. cxlvi. 2.)—Can any unprejudiced man conceive, that this language refers to nothing beyond this poor perishing life on earth?

V. 9. The Psalmist praised God, as if his prediction had already been fulfilled; and he determined to wait still on his name.—The Name of God is glorious and excellent, in the judgment of all his “saints:” and they all deem it right, reasonable, honourable, and profitable, to wait patiently his time, in his ways, for the performance of his promises. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is far worse to glory in wickedness than to perpetrate it: yet many mighty men have been ambitious of being distinguished, by doing extensive mischief with valour or crafty policy. Indeed, poets, orators, and historians have generally celebrated those as heroes, whose conduct has been the reverse of the divine goodness, and the very counterpart of Satan's malice, pride, deceit, and murder; who have abused superior advantages and endowments, to devise and execute plans of more extensive devastation; or who, by slanders and treachery, excite war and bloodshed among those who were at peace.—The words of a deceitful tongue are often, not only as a sharp razor, but more devouring than the sword; and numbers in all ages have loved evil more than good, and lies more than truth, equity, and love. But it is wonderful, 'that any man ' should value himself for being able to do mischief, when ' God esteemeth it his glory to do good;' (Norris, in Bp. Horne;) and his goodness will increase the condemnation of all those, who are emboldened by it in committing iniquity: but it forms the security of those, who depend on it, and copy it as their example.—The believer foresees that God will cast down, sweep away, eradicate, and extirpate from the earth, and destroy for ever in hell, those who do not make him their Strength, but idolize their wealth and prosperity, and who encourage themselves in wickedness: and no criminals will perish with greater exultation to the righteous, than hardened persecutors. Their success is like the luxuriant growth of some poisonous plant, which it is a publick service to destroy. But the righteous man is a fruitful olive-tree, planted in a good soil: he trusts in the everlasting mercy of God, and delights in his ordinances; and, however he may be now afflicted, and thus conformed to the suffering Redeemer, he will wait on the name of the Lord, and will praise him for ever. In expectation of this felicity, let us begin the work of heaven on earth; praying continually that we may only witness, but never share, the perdition of the ungodly.

NOTES.

PSALM LIII. Title. This psalm differs very little from the fourteenth; and it is not known, nor has it been conjectured with much probability, on what account, or for what reason, the same sentiments are repeated in almost the same words. The variations, however, are sufficient to shew, that the psalm in one place was intentionally altered from that in the other; and it is probable, that it was in consequence of some change in the Psalmist's circumstances, or some events which had occurred subsequent to its first publication.—The word Mahalath seems to denote a hollow instrument of musick, a flute or pipe: and Maschil, or instructing, implies the scope of it, viz. an instruction or warning against impiety towards God, and rebellion against his anointed king.

V. 1—4. (Note, xiv. 1—3.) The only variations in these verses are the change, in some instances, of one word for another of nearly the same import.

Understand. (2) מַשְׁכִּיל—Maschil. (Note, Title.) Causing to understand: that is, "Applying the heart to understanding." (Notes, Prov. i. 7. ii. 1—6. John iii. 19—21. Rom. i. 28—32.)—Have, &c. (4) 'Do not the ' workers of iniquity know, that they eat up my people. ' &c.?' Thus the verse is rendered in the old translation.

V. 5. This verse contains much more than the fifth verse in the fourteenth psalm; while the sixth is wholly omitted. (Note, xiv. 4—6.)—The rebels who rose up against David's authority, chiefly because they hated his religion, and were instigated by the spirit of persecution, proved on trial very cowardly; for no doubt God was pleased to impress terror on their hearts, when there was no adequate danger. (Notes, Judg. vii. 16—22. 1 Sam. xiv. 11—15. 2 Kings vii. 6, 7. Prov. xxviii. 1.) Thus the army of Absalom, which encamped against David, was easily routed; numbers fell in the forests; and, being left unburied, their bones were scattered: and because God despised the impotent rage of this abandoned party, his servant easily put them to confusion. (2 Sam. xviii. 6—8.)

V. 6. Note, xiv. 7

PSALM LIV.

David complains of his enemies, and prays for deliverance, 1—3. He glories in the help of God, predicts ruin to his foes, and vows sacrifices and praises, 4—7.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, Maschil, A Psalm of David, ^a when the Ziphims came and said to Saul, Doth not David hide himself with us?

SAVE me, O God, ^b by thy name, and ^c judge me by thy strength.

2 ^d Hear my prayer, O God; give ear to the words of my mouth.

3 For ^e strangers are risen up against me, and ^f oppressors seek after my soul: ^g they have not set God before them. Selah.

4 Behold, ^h God is mine Helper: the Lord is with them that ⁱ uphold my soul.

5 He shall ^k reward evil unto ^{*} mine enemies: ^l cut them off in thy truth.

6 I will ^m freely sacrifice unto thee: ⁿ I will praise thy name, O LORD, ^o for it is good.

7 For ^p he hath delivered me out of all trouble: and ^q mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The folly of sinners greatly appears in their acting, as if they could escape the notice of Omniscience, prosper in defiance of Omnipotence, or be happy in rebellion against the Source of all felicity.—Those who go back from a religious profession, generally become most filthy, or most malicious persecutors, who of all sinners are most infatuated: for God “hath despised,” and will confound and destroy them; as he has often scattered the bones of powerful armies, who have encamped against his church.—A guilty conscience and a dread of vengeance frequently fill the enemies of God with fears, where nothing formidable can be perceived; but at length their worst terrors will be awfully realized: (Note, Prov. x. 24:) and as the deliverance and prosperity of the church on earth will be attended with the ruin of all antichristian opposers; so the eternal joys of the redeemed will be attended with the everlasting shame and misery of all their impenitent oppressors. (Note, Rev. xix. 17—21.)

NOTES.

PSALM LIV. Title. This psalm seems to contain the prayer and confident expectation of David, in the extremity of danger; when the Ziphites led Saul and his army to the very spot, where David and his small company lay concealed; and when, surrounded on every side by blood-thirsty, deceitful foes, nothing but an extraordinary divine interposition could possibly preserve him. Viewed in this light, and compared with the event, it appears peculiarly interesting; and shews that the Psalmist's confidence in God and fervency in prayer, increased in proportion to the emergency. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19—28. xxvi. 1—4.)

V. 1. The honour of God, and of his holy name, was deeply concerned in David's preservation; as the Lord had expressly engaged to give him the kingdom. And as the Omnipotent Judge of all could not want power, to defend his servant from the cruelty and iniquity of Saul and his party, and thus to vindicate his own glory; the Psalmist in assured faith appealed to his righteous decision, and applied for his effectual protection. (Notes, vii. 8—11. xxvi. 1. 1 Sam. xxiv. 8—15.) His argument resembles that of Joshua:—“O LORD, what shall I say, when Israel turn-

V. 2, 3. (Marg. Ref.) The Ziphites belonged to the same tribe as David; yet they acted as strangers: and Saul, the Lord's anointed king, and his party, were become most cruel and blood-thirsty tyrants: for they had “not set God before them. Selah.” Let that be noted. (Notes, iii. 1, 2. xxxvi. 1.)

V. 4. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xi. 1—3. cxviii. 5—13. Is. xii. 2.) Uphold.] Jonathan and some others adhered to David, and upheld his cause: but they were comparatively a small company. This however encouraged him, that “God was with them, and would certainly both prosper and bless them.” (Notes, Gen. xii. 1—3. 1 Chr. xii. 16—18.)

V. 5. In thy truth.] In fulfilling his promises the God of truth would certainly cut off the enemies of his servant. (1 Sam. xxvi. 10.) This was well known; and therefore David only prayed for the accomplishment of the promises, attended with those circumstances, from which it was inseparable.—“The application to Christ and to Christians is plain and easy; for which reason our church hath appointed this psalm to be read on Good Friday.” Bp. Horne. (Notes, xxi. 8—12. lxix. 22—28. cix. 6—20.)

V. 6. It is good.] To offer thank-offerings and praises was right, pleasant, and honourable and acceptable to God. (Notes, xcii. 1, 2. cvii. 8, 9. cxvi. 17—19. Heb. xiii. 15, 16.)

V. 7. The words “his desire” are not in the original, either in this or in any of the similar passages. (Note, xcii. 11.) We may suppose that David, as well as Jeremiah, could say, “I have not desired the woeful day, thou knowest.” (Notes, Jer. xvii. 15—18. xviii. 19, 20. Rom. ix. 1—3.) But he was assured that he should witness the awful judgments of God on his enemies, as well as the performance of his engagements to him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our nearest relations may prove more unkind than strangers; those who ought to protect us may become our oppressors; and mere professors of true religion will generally behave to believers, with malignity and treachery, which even heathens would avoid and condemn. So that, looking unto David betrayed by the men of Judah, and to Jesus betrayed by his apostle, and delivered to death by the Jewish rulers and people; what can we expect from any who “have not set God before them,” except ingratitude, treachery, malice, and cruelty? But God is the Helper of his people: he will favour and prosper those “that uphold “their souls,” while he confounds their persecutors: and his truth is engaged to reward evil to their enemies. Let us trust him and call upon him, when injured or tempted: for his name’s sake he will then save us, and plead our cause with all his power.—We should recollect past deliverances to encourage our faith and prayer in present trials: and it is good and acceptable for us to sacrifice freely our spiritual oblations of grateful praise for the past, while we wait for further mercies.—As the risen and ascended Jesus could adopt the Psalmist’s words, and say, “He hath delivered me from all trouble, and mine eye “hath looked upon mine enemies;” so will his risen people at length be enabled to join in them.—O Lord, help us to bear our cross without repining, and at length bring us to behold, and to share thy victories and glory.

NOTES.

PSALM LV. V. 1. Hide not thyself, &c.] That is, ‘Do not disregard my prayer, nor leave me to myself, when I cry for help in my extreme distress.’ (Notes, xxviii. 1. Lam. iii. 2—9, v. 8.)

V. 2. David’s prayer, under great discomposure of mind was attended by lamentations, sighs, and groans. (Notes, xxii. 1, 2. xxxii. 3—5. Is. xxxviii. 14, 15. Hos. xii. 3—6. Rom. viii. 24—27. Heb. v. 7—10.)

V. 3. They cast iniquity, &c.] This psalm is supposed to have been composed during Absalom’s rebellion. The leaders of that faction, both out of malice, and to strengthen their party, charged David with various crimes of which he was not guilty. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 1—6. P. O. 1—12. Note, xvi. 5—14.)—Thus Christ was falsely accused by those who had taken counsel to put him to death.

V. 4—8. In general David shewed the firmest courage in the most extreme dangers: but the unnatural rebellion of Absalom, which he knew to be the correction of his sin in the matter of Uriah, quite unmanned him; and he was filled with terror and consternation. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 13—15. 23.) Nay, he was become so weary of the treachery and ingratitude of men, and of the cares and disappointments of his high station; that he longed to have done with society, and to hide himself in some desert from the fury and fickleness of his people. He wished, in his haste, for the wings of the harmless dove, that he might “fly away and be at rest;” and his varied expressions, and the representation of the popular commotion as a violent tempest, shew the vehement agitation of his mind. (Note, cxvi. 10, 11.) Yet in his more collected moments he could not approve of such a wish: he was not at liberty to leave his useful station; he could find no rest any where, but in God, with whom he might commune in the midst of society; and he must wait for his more perfect rest, till he had fully served his generation.—‘These words describe ‘the state of David’s mind, when he went over the brook ‘Cedron, and up mount Olivet, “weeping as he went,” ‘and expecting speedily to be cut off: ... they describe ‘the agony of the son of David, when he likewise went ‘over the same brook Cedron, ... at the time of his passion, when his soul was “sore amazed, and very heavy, “and exceeding sorrowful even unto death.”’ Bp. Horne. —It may be added, that at that awful crisis the Saviour also prayed, “If it be possible, let this cup pass from me; “nevertheless not my will but thine be done:” (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 36—39. 42—46. John xviii. 1—3:) and David likewise speedily recovered his composure, and said, “Behold, here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good “unto him.” (Notes, iii. 2 Sam. xv. 24—29.)—The several expressions concur in fixing this period as the date of the psalm; and do not coincide with any thing, that is recorded of David, during his persecution by Saul.

V. 9—11. David had rescued Jerusalem from the Jebusites; and it became “the holy city,” when the ark of God was placed there: (Notes, 2 Sam. v. 6—8. vi. 12—19:) yet it was now become the seat of violence and strife.

This he perceived at the breaking out of Absalom's rebellion, and therefore he would not venture to continue there.
 (Note, 2 Sam. xv. 13—15.) And when the usurper had got possession, mischief and sorrow, wickedness and guile, occupied the city in every part, parading it day and night,
 and guarding it against every approach of piety, equity,
 and loyalty, as against the most dangerous foes. (Note, 2 Sam. xvi. 15—23.) David therefore prayed, that the Lord would render the devices of the usurpers like Babel, by confounding their language and counsels, and thus leaving them to disunion, and mutual jealousies and suspicions. This was granted, when Hushai's counsel was preferred to Ahithophel's; and when that crafty politician, the stay of the whole party, went and hanged himself.
 (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 31. xvii. 1—14. 23.)—Thus the nation of the Jews, after they had rejected Christ, were destroyed by being divided: and Jerusalem, having become the scene of every enormity, was miserably desolated by the Romans.
 (Notes, Matt. xxiii. 34—39.)

V. 12—15. Ahithophel's treachery was peculiarly distressing to David; and it was the more painful for being wholly unsuspected. So far from having been an avowed enemy, who now took occasion to reproach him, and to exult in his calamities, or menace his life; Ahithophel had been David's counsellor and bosom-friend, and had been treated by him as an equal, or as one of his own rank: he had also been his chosen and pleasing companion, in the exercise of religion, and in pious conversation. Yet this very man, without any affront, or previous quarrel, became an apostate and a traitor, and gave Absalom the most malicious and infernal counsel imaginable! (Notes, 2 Sam.
 xvi. 20—23. xvii. 1—4.)—Thus Christ was betrayed by one, whom he had honoured as a companion, a disciple, and an apostle; and who resembled Ahithophel in his crimes and in his doom: for both were speedily overtaken by divine vengeance, in the same dreadful manner. (Note, 2 Sam. xvii. 23. Matt. xxvii. 3—5. John xiii. 18—30.)
 This was foretold by David concerning Ahithophel, and by Jesus concerning Judas: for the words are in the future, and more naturally signify a prediction, than an imprec-

Horne.

V. 16, 17. Notes, l. 7—15. cix. 2—5. Luke vi. 12.—Evening, &c. Acts x. 9—16.)—^b I will never give over my importunity, till he graciously grant my petition, and send me relief.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 18. As this verse is in the past tense, while those which precede and follow it are future; the Psalmist seems to refer to his former experience of the Lord's goodness and faithful care of him; and thus to encourage himself and his friends to expect a happy event to their present perils. (Notes, 1 Sam. xvii. 34—37. 2 Cor. i. 8—11.) In former instances, when far superior forces had attacked him, God had delivered him in peace, and made him triumphant; for his invisible protectors and helpers were more numerous and powerful than all his visible foes. (Notes, 2 Kings vi. 15—17.)—Thus our Lord said, “Think—est thou, that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he “shall presently give me more than twelve legions of “angels?” And angels terrified and drove away the Roman soldiers, rolled away the stone from the sepulchre, and attended his resurrection and ascension. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 47—56. xxviii. 1—8.)

V. 19. He “who inhabiteth eternity,” (Notes, Deut. xxxiii. 27, 28. Is. lvii. 15, 16. Mic. v. 2,) hearing the prayers of his distressed servants, would certainly punish their persecutors; who had been hardened in impiety, by uninterrupted prosperity. Or, God would certainly afflict them, because they would not turn and fear him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

'The most excellent persons have always experienced the basest treatment in this evil world: and the more any mere man has resembled the Son of God, in heavenly zeal and purity; the more has he been traduced and hated by them, whose crimes he opposed, or whose hypocrisy he detected.—The clamours and oppression, the calumnies and malice, of ungodly men may, however, be the more easily endured, if we possess peace of conscience, and a sweet sense of the divine favour. But when our sufferings from men excite in us the sense, or the dread, of the anger of our offended God; when a guilty conscience gives Satan advantage in assaulting our peace, and sapping the foundations of our hope; we must needs "mourn in our complaint," and the thoughts of our hearts will often become like the tempestuous waves of the restless ocean: so that, in this case, even eminent believers have been filled for a time with inexpressible horror and consternation. Yet none of them was ever so overwhelmed with terror and anguish, as the holy Jesus was; when "it pleased the LORD to bruise him, to put him to grief, and to make his soul an offering for our sins." But in "his agony he prayed more earnestly," and was heard and delivered: and if we trust in his merits, and copy his example, we too shall be supported under all, and carried through all.—Those, who are most conversant with mankind, will see the most to disquiet, discourage, and disgust them; if they have a spiritual judgment, and are labouring to do good. Disappointment and vexation, arising from the experience of the inconstancy, ingratitude, and treachery of mankind in general, will sometimes render them weary of the most eminent stations, and honourable services; and make them long for retirement and obscurity, where they may no longer witness the miseries and crimes which they cannot prevent. This should induce us all to seek our rest in God, and to be willing to depart hence to a better world when he pleases: but we must not be "weary of well-doing," or relinquish our work, till our Lord and Master release us: and at last no change can add to our present continued happiness, except that which augments our holiness.—No wickedness so distresses the believer, as that which he witnesses in the visible church of God: with anguish of heart he often perceives violence and discord in the congregations, where the gospel of peace is preached and professed; by which the common cause is weakened, the truth disgraced, and far more mischief done than by all the fury of persecutors.—When professed Christians forsake God, and give way to malice, wickedness, and deceit; destruction and sorrow are at hand: disunion of heart, and intestine quarrels, make way for further evils; and, instead of a holy city, a Babel will be erected, which must also be destroyed.—The true Christian must expect trials from professed friends, from those whom he has most trusted and served, and even from those, with whom he has taken sweet counsel, and associated in the ordinances of God. This will be very painful, but by looking unto Jesus he will be enabled to bear it.—Though we must not pray for the destruction of our most treacherous injurers; yet we may warn them of the doom of those, who before them have trodden in the same path: and in every possible trial let us "call upon the LORD, and he will save us."—Our souls need spiritual nourishment at least as often as our bodies need food: but we generally starve in the midst of abundance; because we pray so seldom, so superficially, and so formally.—David had more loyal subjects than he expected; Christ had more favourers than appeared, when the general cry was, "Crucify him, crucify him:" and there are more true Christians, and believers have more real friends, than in their gloomy hours they suppose. If however God be for us, he will deliver our souls in peace from every conflict, whether few or many side with us: and it is better to have changes and afflictions, than to be hardened by uninterrupted prosperity, and thus emboldened to treachery and cruelty; which generally end in untimely death, and bring men down into the pit of destruction.—Flatterers, whose words are soft and insinuating, are always to be suspected and dreaded: for many of this company "have war in their hearts;" and by smooth, deceitful language do more harm, than they could have done with their drawn swords. But let us learn to trust only in the Lord, and to cast every burden upon him, by faith and prayer: for he will never suffer the righteous to be moved, either for want of inward sup-

NOTES.

PSALM LVI. Title. "Jonath-elem-rechokim," signifies, the silent dove of distant places, or, in a far country.
David had been harmless as a dove, in the midst of Saul's persecutions; he was silent and patient under oppression;
he was now driven, like a timorous dove, to a distance from his home, and from the ordinances of God; and when exposed to extreme danger from the Philistines, set on perhaps by the relations of Goliath, he bore all patiently, and attempted no revenge. In this he typified the harmless, suffering, and patient Jesus. (Note, 1 Sam. xxi. 10—15.)

V. 1, 2. While David remained in the land of Judah, his countrymen fought against him; and at Gath the Philistines sought to slay him. Thus Jews and Gentiles united against Christ; and his disciples are "hated of all men for his name's sake."

inhelando. Robertson. 'They pant after me, with eagerness and rage in order to devour me.' Thus Saul of Tarsus "breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of Christ." (Notes, xxvii. 1—3. Job xxxi.
9—32. Am. ii. 6—8. Acts ix. 1, 2.)

O thou most High. (2) אֲלֹהִים, altum, celsitudo. Robertson.
The clause may be rendered, "There are many who fight against me from on high," or, from a safe and fortified place. The original word is not the same, as is generally rendered, "most High."

V. 3, 4. David was himself greatly alarmed, when at Gath; but in that day "when he feared," he determined till to trust in God; and to honour his word, and glory in it, as a full security in every possible danger. For, in celebrating the perfections and works of God, he would especially praise his word, his most gracious promises, and unfailing faithfulness in performing them, and this even while waiting for that performance. (Notes, xii. 5, 6. cxxxviii. 2. Num. xxiii. 19, 20. Matt. xxiv. 32—35. John

i. 17.) He especially referred to the promises of God, that he should be king over Israel. What flesh, &c. (4) 2 Chr.

V. 5. Wrest my words.] Or, "They thwart me in all "my concerns." The words, in either sense of them, with the rest of this and the following verses, emphatically describe the conduct of the scribes and priests towards the Lord Jesus, which the insidious perverseness and disingenuity, with which Saul and his courtiers treated David, greatly resembled. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. Marg. Ref.—Note, xlix. 5.

V. 8. David was continually removing from place to place, as if he had been a vagabond: (Gen. iv. 14:) but the Lord numbered all his wanderings, and watched over him wherever he went. His tears also were noticed, as if preserved in a bottle, or registered in a book: no doubt therefore his life would be precious in the sight of the Lord. 'If God keep the tears of his saints in store, much 'more will he remember their blood to avenge it; and
'though tyrants burn the bones, yet can they not blot the 'tears and blood out of God's register.' (Marg. Ref.)— Wanderings.] In the translation used in the Common Prayer Book, the word flittings is used. This is a provincial term for removing from one residence to another: but it is not generally understood.

V. 13. The Lord had rescued David from many imminent perils of death: and he trusted that he would keep him from falling by the hands of his enemies; that he might live, to walk before him, as his anointed king, in prosperity and usefulness. Or he meant, that God, having saved his soul by converting grace, would uphold him in the ways of holiness, in which he desired to walk till he came to heaven. (Notes, cxvi. 8, 9. cxlv. 14.)—Light of the living.] Notes, Job xxxiii. 27—30. Rev. xxi. 22—27.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The heavy and continued trials, through which many of the Lord's servants have passed, should teach us to be silent and patient under our lighter afflictions. "We have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin." Our good words may indeed be wrested to an evil meaning; and our footsteps watched by those, who devise evil against us: but we are not in general endangered by furious assailants, who would swallow us up, and destroy us; or at least, those who would oppress us have their hands bound or otherwise employed. Yet are we often tempted to repine and despond under our lighter sorrows! For this we should check and condemn ourselves; and, under every disquieting fear, we should place our confidence in God, and pray more earnestly for his pardoning mercy.—Meditation on the power of the Most High, engaged by his most gracious and faithful promises to his people, will encourage us to say with boldness, "The Lord is my Helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me." (Note, Heb. xiii. 5, 6.) The believer's soul, body, character, and interest, are all safe under the divine protection; and when he prays earnestly, his enemies will be driven back and disappointed.—Men may for a time prosper in and by iniquity; but God in his anger will soon cast them down: and our only security lies in escaping from iniquity.—The Lord graciously notes and orders the removals of his people: while they keep in the path of duty, they cannot be driven from his gracious presence; and their tears of godly sorrow, and those which are extorted by persecution, or sympathy with the sufferings of others, will be reserved to be jewels in their crown of glory. Let us then be careful to discharge our own obligations.—General vows are upon us as Christians, which have been ratified at baptism and the Lord's supper; and we have made promises and engagements in seasons of trouble and distress. Let us conscientiously perform them, when delivered; and then we may leave all the rest with the Lord: and if his grace have delivered our souls from the death of sin; he will deliver our feet from falling, and bring us to heaven, to walk before him for ever "in the light of the living," in the bright world of perfect knowledge, love, purity, and felicity.

PSALM LVIII.

David reproves unjust elders and judges, 1, 2. He describes the odious character of the wicked, 3—5. He predicts their ruin, and the joy of the righteous, on beholding the just judgments of God upon them, 6—11

V. 5. If David had been destroyed by his fierce enemies, God would have been dishonoured: but his marvellous deliverance and advancement would be honourable to the name of the Lord; and even angels in heaven, as well as men on earth, would glorify him on that account. V. 7—11. The Psalmist here suddenly changes his language from deep complaints to exulting praises. His heart, delivered from desponding fears, was prepared, and fixed in a determination to praise God, and to employ his tongue and all his musical powers in that service: with this he would awaken the morning, or begin the day; and he would render his worship as publick as he possibly could, that both the Israelites and the surrounding nations might hear.—This may with peculiar propriety be applied to Jesus, as risen from the dead, and exulting in the view of the glory which would redound to God in the conversion of the Gentiles. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

Protection from man’s injustice must be sought from the Lord’s mercy; and the most eminent believers need frequently to reiterate the publican’s prayer, “God be merciful to me, a sinner.” But an inward consciousness, that our souls trust in the Lord, may enable us in the most imminent dangers, to expect, that our calamities will at length be over-past: and, in the mean time, by faith and prayer, we must make the shadow of his almighty wings our refuge.—If we have fled from the wrath to come unto Jesus Christ, we are interested in all his merits, grace, and victories; and in all the precious promises and glorious perfections of our God: and he, who has performed all things requisite to the salvation of his people, will in answer to our prayers perform all things for us, and in us, which are needful to our enjoyment of it. It is true that the sons of men, among whom we live, are often savage as lions, and fierce as the flaming fire: their teeth seem to be spears and arrows, and their slanderous tongues, sharp swords: and Satan, a still more subtle, powerful, and cruel enemy, would swallow us up. But notwithstanding their snares and pits, their stratagems and assaults, we are safe, if we belong to the Lord. The Redeemer was far more exposed to their rage and malice, and by their wicked hands was crucified and slain: yet the Lord sent from heaven and raised him from the dead, and advanced him to his glorious throne: and he will, through him, send forth his mercy and truth, and graciously accomplish his promises; he will rescue our souls from all tempters and persecutors; and angels shall join with men in beholding and celebrating his glory in our salvation. Let us then seek to have our hearts fixed on him, and prepared for his spiritual worship; to celebrate the praises of his boundless mercy and unfailing faithfulness, and to “glorify him with body and spirit, which are his.” Let us assuredly expect and wait for the completion of what concerneth us: and let us earnestly pray, that the Lord may be exalted above the heavens, and his glory above all the earth, by extending the blessings of his gospel through every part of every land, in all the world. process against David; and, by corrupting the assembly of the elders, obtained an iniquitous sentence of treason against him, in order to cover his malicious persecution. Thus the Sanhedrim and the people of the Jews, and Pilate, condemned Jesus to be put to death. In both cases, the persons concerned inwardly designed and loved wickedness; and, while they pretended to weigh the cause in the balance of justice, they used their power to commit violence, even after having deliberately considered the nature and consequences of their conduct: and this was the more heinous, as it was perpetrated by the magistrates placed over the people of God, "in the land" where his name was worshipped, and his oracles made known. In respect of their conduct, therefore, the Psalmist makes a most solemn appeal to their consciences, and expressly charges them with extreme guilt. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lxxxii. 1—7.)

V. 3—5. The Psalmist here traced back the base conduct of his persecutors, (as he had done his own crimes, Note, li. 5, 6,) to the source of original depravity; which had neither been counteracted by proper discipline, nor subdued by regenerating grace.—All wickedness springs from the alienation of the heart from God, being "estranged" from him: and children very soon manifest evil tempers, and contract habits of lying and of other vices. If therefore they grow up, without change or restraint, and escape with impunity, or are even encouraged in wickedness, as Saul's courtiers and judges were; they will at length be hardened in sin, and ready to perpetrate any villainy. The most hateful dispositions are found as natural to them, and as fatal to others, as the poison of a serpent. It was indeed commonly allowed, that some kind of musick, or skilful incantations, would disarm the rage of serpents, in general: yet one species of adder seemed to be deaf, or as if she stopped her ears against the most skilful strains of those who attempted to charm her: thus no arguments, persuasions, or services of David, could mollify the envenomed malice of Saul and his party against him.—In like manner the heavenly discourses and the beneficent miracles of Jesus did not disarm the rage of that "generation of vipers" against him: (Notes, cxi. 1—3. Matt. iii. 7—10. xxiii. 29—33:) and sinners still stop their ears, and close their hearts against conviction or per-

V. 6—9. David's enemies were strong and fierce as young lions: he therefore prayed that their teeth might be broken, even their strongest teeth, their grinders, with which they were ready to devour him: that so they might be disabled from doing mischief. (Notes, xxvii. 1—3. lvi. 1, 2. lvii. 4.) They overwhelmed him like an inundation: but he desired it might prove like a land-flood, which is soon wasted. They were about to shoot at him: but he would have their bows, or their arrows, to be shivered to pieces, and become like straw, and do no execution; and he prayed that they might waste insensibly as the snail, which leaves its substance all along its track; and that they might come to nothing, like an abortion. He also predicted, that their prosperous rage, (which resembled the crackling of thorns under a pot,) would soon be extinct, and produce no effect: while the Lord in his wrath would hurry them into speedy destruction; as a furious whirlwind drives a living man down a precipice, or into a dreadful pit. This seems the meaning of the passage; but the original is somewhat obscure to us. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10, 11. David's cause was that of true religion; and though he would not avenge himself, he knew that the Lord would, and with terrible displays of his power and wrath. Then the righteous would rejoice, not in the misery of Saul and his party, but in the display of the divine glory, and in the triumphs of truth and piety over ungodliness and iniquity: nay, the most terrible circumstances of their ruin would add to the comfort and purity of the righteous; as if a man should wash his feet in the blood of those, who had trampled upon every thing sacred: while all, who witnessed these events would be constrained to confess, "Verily there is a reward," (or fruit,) "for the righteous; verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth." (Both the word for "God," and that translated "that judgeth," are in the plural. Note, Gen. i. 1.)—All this was most signally verified in the destruction of Jerusalem, after the Jews had crucified their Messiah: and it has had, and will have, repeated accomplishments, in the establishment of true Christianity upon the ruins of its opposers, but the day of judgment will be its grand and final accom-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

Injustice established by law, and decreed by judges, is more malignant than any other.—It is grievous to behold the sons of men preying upon their own species; but more so to see the congregation of those, who profess to be the children of God, combining against the remnant of his true people. We may very properly appeal to the consciences of such iniquitous judges, whether indeed they speak righteously and decide uprightly. But the malice, avarice, or pride of their hearts prevails against their convictions; and their iniquity is intentional, deliberate, and determined.—While we behold the effects of natural depravity in the atrocious crimes of others; we should be humbled by recollecting, that the principles of them all are in our hearts also. We ought therefore to be thankful to the Lord for merciful restraints; earnest in seeking renewing grace; watchful over ourselves; and patient under the effects of our fallen nature in others. We may see, in our children, the wickedness of the world in embryo: their dislike to religion, their ingenuity at inventing lies, their pride, obstinacy, vanity, envy, and anger, are rank weeds, which if neglected, will overspread their minds, and prevent the growth of every good thing. It is our duty therefore to bestow much pains upon their education; and above all to pray for converting grace to make them new creatures.—But, though the poison of a serpent is within us, we may prevent in great measure its breaking forth to the injury of others. When the Saviour's instructions, reasonings, and persuasions are duly regarded, the very serpent becomes harmless and gentle like the dove. (Note, Is. xi. 6—9.) But those, who refuse to hear him that speaks to them in strains of heavenly wisdom, must perish miserably and eternally; nor can all nature furnish images adequately to represent their dreadful doom. Though the righteous are not “glad at calamities,” yet they must rejoice to see the cause of God triumphant, and men on every side convinced that there is a reward for the righteous, and “a God who judgeth the earth.” They must therefore exult on some occasions, in the ruin of terrible persecutors: they will in due time rejoice at the destruction of all antichristian corrupters of the faith: and at last, they will witness the perdition of ungodly men with unmingled joy, and sing, “So let all thine enemies perish, “O LORD.” (Notes, lxviii. 1—3. Judg. v. 31. Esth. viii. 15—17. ix. 17—32. Prov. xi. 10, 11.)

NOTES.

PSALM LIX. Title. (Notes, 1 Sam. xix. 11—18.) In this Psalm David expresses what his thoughts and affections were, when Saul sent officers to watch his house all night, and to slay him when he came out of his doors in ‘the morning.’ Bp. Patrick.—His triumphant confidence in God in this extreme danger, and his anticipated fervour of gratitude, for the deliverance which he fully expected, shew a peculiarly pious and happy state of mind, in such trying circumstances.

V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref.) Defend. (1) Or, “Thou shalt “set me on high, &c.” The clause is future, and implies the strongest assurance of safety, and advancement above all enemies, grounded on the special promises of God. (Notes, xii. 5, 6. xxvii. 4—6. xci. 14—16. Is. xxxiii. 15, 16.)

V. 3, 4. David had not in any thing offended Saul, but was persecuted by him and his adherents, for his good deeds, not for his sins: and in this he typified the suffering, but perfectly holy Jesus. (Notes, vii. 3—5. xxvii. 1—3. 1 Sam. xviii. 12—16. xix. 1—7. John xv. 22—25.)

V. 5. Heathen.] גוֹיִם, nations, Gentiles. (Notes, 8. x. 16. Is. i. 10—15. Jer. ix. 25, 26. Am. ix. 7—10.)—Be not merciful, &c.] The Lord’s mercy and patience, towards the inveterate enemies of his cause, appeared to David ruinous to the interests of true religion in Israel: but the words are also a prediction of that judgment “without “mercy,” which will be executed upon all the implacable opposers of Christ and his people.—Those who repent cease to be “wicked transgressors,” and “perfidious “workers of iniquity;” none of the impenitent will find mercy: and as far as it can be ascertained, that this is the awful case of any persons, we are not required to pray for them; nor forbidden to pray against them, that by the righteous judgment of God, they may be prevented from doing further mischief. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Tim. iv. 14, 15. 1 John v. 16—18. Rev. vi. 9—11.)

to hunt their prey, with menaces and reproaches, as the hound makes a noise when upon the scent after the hunted animal: thus they compassed the city to prevent his escape. The Scribes and Pharisees also chose the night for the season of their machinations against the Son of David. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 1, 2. John xviii. 1—3.)

V. 7. The reviling menaces and proud boastings, which were vented from the furious malice of these persecutors, wounded David's peace and reputation like swords, and subserved their designs of murdering him: nor would they have dared to utter such notorious falsehoods, if they had not disbelieved the being of a God, or their accountability to him. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lv. 20, 21. lvii. 4.)

V. 8. (Notes, ii. 1—6.)—In this Psalm, (Note, 5,) and in other places, the Israelites, who set themselves against the man “after God's own heart,” are called “the heathen:” and in like manner the Jews, when they had crucified the Son of David, and persisted in refusing to submit to him, were excluded from the church of God, and have ever since been treated as a part of the Gentile world; except as marked with more striking indications of the divine displeasure. (Notes, Is. lxxv. 13—15. Hos. iii. 4, 5.)

V. 9. “The more strong and the more malicious Saul is, the more will I look unto thee; ... for thou, O God, art my sure Refuge in my greatest distresses.” Bp. Hall.—Some, however, suppose that the Psalmist, when he says, “Because of his strength,” refers to the almighty power of God, as the ground of his cheerful confidence. (Marg.—Note, 1, 2.)

V. 10. God, who had always shewn mercy and loving kindness to his servant, would certainly come to his aid in this emergency, in some way beyond all human expectation; so that when he seemed to stand afar off, he would shew himself present, to keep his enemies from hurting him. He would also exceed the hope of his friends; and even prevent him, by answering his prayers, while he was employed in offering them. (Is. lxxv. 24.) Thus God would cause David to look on his enemies without dismay, and to behold their disappointment.—His conduct, when he heard of Saul's death, implies, that he had not desired, though he had foreseen, the woeful day. (Marg. Ref.—Note, liv. 7.)

V. 11—13. The rejection of the Jewish nation, their long continued dispersion, and their preservation as a distinct people, reminding men all over the earth of God's vengeance on those who reject his gospel, and proudly despise and blaspheme his Son; (while every successive generation allows the deeds of their fathers, by their enmity against Christianity;) form such a striking accomplishment of this passage, that we must conclude the Holy Spirit intended these events in them: though it is probable that David meant the disgrace, degradation, and gradual extirpation of Saul's family, for their opposition to the Lord's Anointed, and all their imprecations and calumnies against him. Other obstinate opposers of genuine Christianity may also be intended. (Marg. Ref.)—“They shall be taken in their pride, &c.” (12) “And they” (or, men) “shall know, unto the ends of the earth, that God ruleth, &c.” (13) Had the nation of Israel been wholly extirpated for their crimes, especially for crucifying their Messiah, and their obstinate and persevering opposition to him and his cause; or had they been incorporated with the Gentiles, among whom they were dispersed; the awful event would in time have been forgotten, and many important benefits to the cause of true religion prevented. But their continuance through successive ages, a separate people, scattered amidst all nations, has been, and is, a most important proof that Christianity is of God; and will doubtless make way for still more surprising events, in their restoration, and the consequences of it to the world at large. (Notes, Num. xxiii. 9. Jer. xxx. 10, 11. Hos. iii. 4, 5. Rom. xi. 11—15. 22—32.)

V. 14, 15. These verses may mean, that the punishment of David's persecutors would be answerable to their crimes: their clamours against him would be followed by howlings of distress, like those of the dog that is starving with hunger: they would in vain compass the city to find food, and would grudge all that went beside them. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 6.)—The extreme famine in Jerusalem, when besieged by the Romans; and the state of the Jewish nation ever since, as destitute of the Bread of life, might be alluded to.—But some think, that David here again describes the conduct of his enemies, as foretelling and rejoicing in their disappointment; and that having repeated what he said before, adds what should be translated, “They wander up and down to devour me: and if they be not satisfied, they tarry all night.” The words are throughout in the future tense, and may properly be thus rendered: “Surely they shall not be satisfied, though they tarry all night.” (Title.—Marg.)

V. 17. Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Pet. v. 10, 11.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we suffer for well-doing, we are conformed to our Redeemer, and have an evidence of our acceptance with God. We should indeed greatly fear suffering as “evil-doers, or busy-bodies in other men’s matters;” but we ought not to be either afraid or ashamed of the hatred of the workers of iniquity, when “they prepare themselves, and are gathered together against us, without our fault.” (Notes, Matt. v. 10—12. 1 Pet. iii. 13—18. iv. 12—16.) They may be both mighty and bloody; their words may be as swords, and their actions may correspond with them: but the Lord will awake, and behold, and hasten to the help of his servants.—In vain did Saul and his mighty men seek the life of David: they could not prevent his advancement to the throne, but they occasioned their own ignominy and ruin. Nor could the rulers of the Jews, by crucifying Jesus, prevent his glorification; but they thus hastened their own destruction: and neither tempters nor persecutors can succeed any better, in lying in wait for the soul of the believer. The serpent and his seed bruised the heel of the Redeemer, but he will crush their head. (Note, Gen. iii. 14, 15.) “Because of the LORD’s strength,” his servants may then confidently wait on him: and if we trust in him, as the God of our mercy, and have recourse to him in every temptation and tribulation, he will assuredly be our Defence against all those who rise up against us. In proportion as we are conscious, that we are not “wicked transgressors,” who continue impenitent in known sin, we may be satisfied that our cause is of God.—The predictions, which we read, concerning the vengeance to be executed on all the implacable enemies of Christ and his kingdom, and upon all the impenitent and unbelieving; and the accomplishment of many of them in this present world; should impress our minds with an awe of the divine Majesty and purity, and with dread of all iniquity.—The destruction of Jerusalem, and the state of the Jewish nation for much above seventeen hundred years, when viewed in connexion with that awful imprecation upon themselves and their children, which accompanied their malice and lying testimony against Christ, and with their cry, “Crucify him, crucify him;” should make us tremble at the thought of lies and imprecations, which are the offspring of pride and hatred; (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 19—25;) and still more, lest we should at last be found despisers or abusers of his gospel. But we should also pray for the conversion of that people; that they may at length know, that Jesus is Lord and God, and that “he ruleth in Jacob, and unto the ends of the earth.” Our prayers, however, for our personal enemies and the opposers of our holy faith, should be attended with solemn warnings: for no mercy will be shewn to obstinate and impenitent transgressors; but they will be eternal monuments of the Lord’s abhorrence of sin, while his wrath will be unto them as a devouring, yet unquenchable fire. But the trials of the upright will terminate in joy and praise: when the night of affliction is over, they will sing of the Lord’s power and mercy in the morning. (Note, xxx. 5.) He is their Defence and Refuge in the time of their trouble: let them now, therefore, in assured faith and hope, praise him for those mercies, for which they will rejoice in him and praise him for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM LX. Title. “Shushan-eduth” seems to mean, ‘a psalm of testimony set to an instrument of six strings.’ The psalm was intended to testify, and teach, the danger of opposing the servants of God, and the happiness of uniting with them.—“Aram-naharaim,” or Syria of the two rivers, that is, Syria between the Tygris and the Euphrates, denotes Mesopotamia; and Aram-zobah, Syria to the west of the Euphrates. dismayed. (Note, 1 Sam. xxxi. 7.) The setting up of Ishbosheth over the ten tribes, and the consequent division and civil war, made the land to tremble, broke its force, and exposed it to the common enemy. Thus the people of God, for their sins, were shewed "hard things," and made to drink the wine of astonishment, as if they had been his enemies. (Notes, lxxv. 8. Is. li. 17—23. Jer. xxv. 15—17. Lam. iv. 21, 22. Hab. ii. 15—17. Matt. xx. 20—23. xxvi. 36—39.) For the wound made by a skilful surgeon may be as painful, as that made by a mortal foe; though it be given with a contrary intention, and save life instead of destroying it. (Notes, Job v. 18, 19. Is. xxx. 26. Hos. vi. 1—3.)—When the Israelites supported Saul, whom God had rejected, and who was evidently given up to the most furious passions, and to adopt the most ruinous measures; when to please him they concurred in persecuting David, the Lord's anointed, whose wisdom and courage, as well as exemplary piety, loyalty, and patriotism, entitled him to their highest esteem and confidence; and when after Saul's death they, at Abner's instance, adhered to Ishbosheth, and carried on war against David, in direct opposition to the known will of God; they seemed to be perfectly infatuated, as if they had drunk some intoxicating poison, which had bereaved them of their senses, and so filled them with terror and amazement, that they knew not what they did. (Note, 2 Sam. ii. 9. 12, 13. iii. 17—21. v. 1, 2.)

V. 4. David, as anointed by God and advanced to the throne, was a banner given to the pious remnant of Israel: and it was displayed, that they might resort to it, and under his authority and command, expect the performance of the Lord's faithful promises, and the triumphing of his truth. (Notes, xx. 5. Ex. xvii. 15, 16.)—In this especially he was a type of Christ, and his kingdom and salvation. (Notes, Is. xi. 11—16. xlix. 22, 23. lix. 16—19. lxii. 10—12. John xii. 27—33, v. 32.)

V. 5. David was beloved of God, as his name signifies; (Notes, 1 Sam. xvi. 10, 11. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31;) and he was a type of his "beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased." But the words in the original are plural, and evidently relate to Israel as the Lord's chosen and beloved people: (Marg. Ref.) and the verse contains the intercession of David for his subjects; prefiguring, in this, our heavenly Advocate, who never fails to plead in behalf of all, however heretofore rebellious, who bow to the sceptre of his grace, and come to God by him. (Note, Heb. vii. 23—25. 1 John ii. 1, 2.)

V. 6—12. (Notes, lxxxix. 19—37. cviii. 6—13. 2 Sam. vii.) God had, by ordering David to be anointed, as Saul's successor in the kingdom, virtually promised him the throne over all Israel; as he had to Israel the dominion over the adjacent countries. The promises had been in part fulfilled, as they related to David. Shechem, Succoth, Gilead, and Manasseh, were in his possession. These had been subject to Ishbosheth; who had also been supported by Ephraim, that powerful tribe, which was now become the guardian of David's government and person: the legislative authority was transferred to the tribe of Judah, where it would continue till the coming of the Messiah: and while Israel, being willingly subject to David's equitable government, shared its blessings; the neighbouring nations were about to be forced into submission. Moab would soon be reduced to bondage, and employed in the lowest menial services. David also fully expected in a short time to vanquish Edom, and take possession of it, by casting his shoe over it; or treading it under his feet and crushing its strength, as it had been predicted: (Marg. Ref. b.) and let Philistia now triumph over Israel as in times past, if it could. This appears to be an ironical challenge and defiance. (Marg.) These conquests, however, were not yet completed. Bozrah of Edom, or some other strong city, (perhaps Rabbah of the Ammonites,) yet remained unsubdued: but David would not rely on his own valour and conduct, nor on those of his captains or allies, for completing his conquests; but on the Lord, who had before "cast off his people," but was now returned to them, and fought for them: and their enemies would soon perceive the difference between the armies of David, which JEHOVAH accompanied to the battle, and those of Saul, when JEHOVAH had doomed him to destruction.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The anger of God against sin is the sole cause of all misery, personal or publick, in families, churches, and nations, which has been, is, or shall be endured, in time or to eternity.—Professing churches are often cast off, and deprived of their privileges for their sins; nations tremble and are broken for the same cause; yea, the earth, and creation itself, groans under the load of man's guilt. (Note, Rom. viii. 18—23.) Even the true believer, when he commits iniquity, will sometimes be shewed heavy things, and made to drink of the wine of astonishment, till anguish and dismay for a time seize upon him. In all these cases, there is no remedy, but by returning to the Lord with repentance, faith, and prayer; and beseeching him to return to us, and heal the breaches which sin has made. Blessed be his name, "he hath given a banner," in the cross of Christ, to those who fear his name; that resorting thither, and receiving mercy, they may enlist under him who now fills the mediatorial throne, and so wage successful war against the enemies of their souls. Oh, may this banner be every where displayed, that all nations on the face of the earth may embrace the truth, and experience the faithfulness of God to his promises!—He, who exalted the Saviour by his own right hand to the throne of glory, will hear his intercession for all who pray in his name, and who are beloved for his sake; and save them also by his almighty power. He, who is in Christ a new creature, may rejoice in all the precious promises, which God "hath spoken in his holiness," and by his Holy One; and may consider the whole ransomed inheritance as his own reversion: and the present privileges to which he is called, and the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Spirit which he experiences, are the sure earnest of heavenly glory. If Christ be our's, all things are our's; mercy, grace, peace, wisdom, righteousness, strength, and victory, life and death, angels and men, earth and heaven are our's; and all things shall, in one way or other, be rendered subservient to our eternal good. (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—39. 1 Cor. iii. 18—23.) We are not, however, as yet made complete conquerors; and no true believer will abuse these truths, to the allowed indulgence of sloth or vain confidence.—We are still called to put on, and use our spiritual armour, and to prepare for fresh conflicts, perhaps more trying than any which we have yet experienced: (Notes, Eph. vi. 10—18:) trusting, however, in God to lead us forth and support us, and to give us strength in every time of trouble, we may do valiantly and tread down all our enemies, and we shall ere long obtain the conqueror's crown. But vain is the help or salvation of man, or of creatures, even far more in things spiritual and eternal, than in our temporal concerns: so that those who trust and pray to saints and angels, and expect salvation from them; will be overcome by the enemy and finally perish.—But our Mediator, through whom we come to the Father, and trust in him, is "Emmanuel," God over all "blessed for evermore;" and believers, when strong in faith, "can do all things, through Christ who strengtheneth them." (Notes, 2 Cor. xii. 7—10. Phil. iv. 10—13.) The church also, over which oppressors have so often insulted, as if the Lord had cast her off, shall speedily triumph over them all: and while those who willingly submit to our anointed King shall share his glories, all his foes shall be put under his feet. (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 20—28.)

NOTES.

PSALM LXI. V. 1, 2. This psalm seems to have been composed, when David was driven by Absalom's rebellion, like an exile, beyond Jordan, to the extremities of the promised land, and far from the sanctuary of God. (Notes, xli. 1—3. xlii. 1—8. xliii. lxiii. 1—4. 2 Sam. xv. 13—15. 23—30.) His heart was overwhelmed with complicated distresses, as by an inundation. The divine mercy, support, and protection formed the rock, on which he desired to rest his soul, out of the reach of the tempestuous waves, which dashed and raged below: yet he was like the shipwrecked mariner, who is exposed to the raging billows, from which he would be secured, if he could reach the summit of a rock that is close to him; but it is far too high for him to climb it without help. Thus David found, that he could not by faith and hope ascend the "Rock of salvation," and be established on it, unless the Lord led him to it and helped him to ascend it, and to stand firm upon it. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xl. 1—5.)

V. 3. 'Nothing doth more strengthen our faith, than the remembrance of God's succour in times past.' (Marg. Ref.—Notes, iii. 3—5. lxxi. 17, 18. cxvi. 2. 1 Sam. vii. 12 xvii. 34—37. 2 Cor. i. 8—11.)

PSALM LXII.

David avows his confidence in God, and warns his enemies of their danger, 1—7. He exhorts the people to trust in the Lord; and not in men, nor in iniquity, nor in riches, 8—10: for power and mercy belong to God, 11, 12.

the courts of God, rested assured that he should be restored again to them, and perpetually enjoy the comfort and benefit of publick ordinances: (Note, xxvii. 4—6:) but he seems also to have looked through the shadow of the earthly sanctuary, to “the holy places not made with hands,” and to have exulted in hope of the eternal felicity of heaven; as now abiding under the covert of the Almighty, and being “kept by his power through faith unto salvation.” For it can hardly be supposed, that he meant his temporal authority, which was given to him alone, by that “heritage of those that fear the name of God,” which had been given him in common with other pious persons, in answer to his earnest prayers and solemn vows.

For ever. (4) For ages (עוֹלָמִים). This must imply far more, than the one age, which David lived on earth, and which at the time when this was written was drawing near to a close. (Notes, cxlv. 1, 2. cxlvi. 2.)—Wings.] (Marg. Ref.—Note, Ruth ii. 11, 12.) ‘Wings of the cherubim,’ say some. These indeed covered the mercy-seat. (Notes, Ex. xxv. 10—21.) But they were placed in the holy of holies, and inaccessible to the worshippers, and were emblems of the angels looking into the mysteries of redemption, and joining in the worship of the redeemed. (Notes, 1 Pet. i. 10—12. Rev. v. 11—14.)

V. 6, 7. David might here mean himself as king of Israel: though apparently deposed, he trusted, that he should yet live, and reign over the people of God, for some time to come; and his kingdom would be continued in his posterity to future generations, according as God had mercifully promised, and would faithfully perform.—But the King Messiah, as descending from him, who was to reign for ever over the house of Israel, and by whom the mercy and truth prepared for sinful men was to be conferred, seems to have been especially intended. (Note, John i. 17.) Whatever became of David's personal interests, he rejoiced in the prospect of the Messiah's kingdom; and prayed for the faithful performance of God's gracious promises, which form the stability of his mediatorial throne.—The Chaldee paraphrast expounds ‘this passage of Messiah only; ‘Thou shalt add days to ‘the days of King Messiah; his years shall be as the ‘generation of this world, and of the world to come.’ Bp. Horne.

V. 8. Marg. Ref.—Note, lxxv. 13—16.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When removed from other comforts, we should more earnestly seek consolation from God; and when cares, fears, sorrows, or temptations, like a wild deluge, overwhelm our hearts, our cries unto him should be more fervent than ever.—No outward situation can exclude us from communion with God through Jesus Christ; but without divine assistance, we can neither climb, nor take shelter in, that Rock of salvation: when therefore we perceive that there is safety in him and none in ourselves, we should pray fervently for the Holy Spirit of promise, that we may by his gracious teaching and assistance, “believe to the saving of our souls.” As genuine experience is acquired, encouragement will abound: for we shall more readily trust in the covert of his wings, when he has been heretofore “a Shelter for us, and a strong Tower from our enemies.”—When we have the opportunity we should keep close to the ordinances of God: and we should remember, that he hears our vows, and witnesses our pious desires, intentions, and engagements; and therefore we should daily perform them. If he have given us the goodly “heritage of those that fear his name,” (Note, cvi. 4, 5,) we shall have enough: our anointed King is alive for evermore; and all his true subjects shall live by him and with him, and thus “abide before God for ever.” Being made partakers of that grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ, we may rejoice and sing praise unto him, whatever be our outward circumstances: and while, according to our engagements, we are daily employed in his pleasant service, we may cheerfully hope to sing praises to him for ever and ever.

NOTES.

PSALM LXII. Title. Jeduthun was first chosen to be one of the chief musicians, when the ark was removed to mount Zion: (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 37—43. xxv. 1—6:) and, as this psalm is inscribed to him, some have thought, that it relates to Absalom's rebellion, and not to the persecution which David endured from Saul. But, as several other psalms, which certainly were composed before David came to the throne, are inscribed to “the chief Musician;” we must suppose, that when the Psalmody at the sanctuary was appointed, David delivered to the chief musicians the psalms which he had previously written, as well as those which he afterwards from time to time composed.—Internal evidence does not clearly shew to which season of distress the Psalmist referred; as his language seems equally suited to either of them.—‘There are no petitions at all in this psalm, nor any thanksgivings: but only expressions of David's faith and confidence in God.’ Bp. Patrick. It may be added, ‘joined with exhortations and encouragements to others, to trust in God, and pour out prayer before him.’

silent. (Marg.) "Yet my soul keepeth silence unto God." "Though Satan tempted him to murmur against God, yet he bridled his affections, and, resting upon God's promise, he beareth his cross patiently." "The prophet abode manifold temptations, but resting on God, he overcame them all."—David was conscious, that, in calm submission and well-grounded confidence he sought and expected protection and deliverance from God. He therefore steadily adhered to the line of duty; believing it "good both to hope, and quietly wait for the salvation of the LORD." (Note, Lam. iii. 26—30.) And he rested assured, that though his enemies might for a while give him disturbance, and in some degree prevail, yet he should not be "greatly moved," or materially injured, either in his temporal or spiritual concerns. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 5—7. xxxvii. 23, 24. 2 Cor. iv. 8—12.)

V. 3, 4. The Psalmist, having avowed his confidence in God, expostulates with his enemies, warns them of their danger, and exposes their wickedness.—Saul and his party, envious of David's reputation, incessantly plotted against his life; and aimed to exclude him from the royal dignity, to which God had appointed him; and they greatly desired to see him disgraced by some evident misconduct. They "delighted in lies," both when they falsely accused him, and when they deceitfully spoke as friends to him: but by this they would only provoke God to cut them off by a violent death; and they would be overturned, like a wall, which first bulges out and totters, and then falls down at once. (Notes, Is. xxx. 12—14. Ez. xiii. 10—16.)—In like manner, Absalom, Ahithophel, and the other conspirators, artfully formed their measures for driving, with disgrace, their aged monarch from that honourable station to which God had raised him; (Note, lv. 20, 21;) and they covered their treachery and malice with fair pretences: but they also brought on themselves swift and dreadful destruction.—The opposition of the Jews, and other enemies, to Christ and his cause, springs from similar motives, is conducted in the same manner, and has had, or will have, the same event. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—7. The Septuagint render the fifth verse, "Never"theless, my soul, submit to God; for my patience is from him:" and no doubt quiet submission to God, as well as expectation of deliverance, happiness, and honour from him alone, in his own time and manner, was meant.—The repetitions, with some variation, of these verses are peculiarly animated: and the Psalmist, by thus dwelling on the ground of his encouragement, baffled his temptations, and found his faith and hope invigorated. (Note, 1, 2.) He says before, "I shall not be greatly moved" (2); now, "I shall not be moved."

V. 8—10. The Psalmist, having risen above the disquietude and fear to which he had been tempted, next gives counsel and caution to the people in general, as he had before awfully warned his persecutors. He exhorts them to "trust in God at all times," whatever their outward circumstances or inward conflicts might be; and by fervent prayer to pour out their hearts before him, (Marg. Ref. y,) and they would find him a secure Refuge in every danger.—But as for men, no confidence could be reasonably placed, either on the fickle multitude, who might be induced to murder, one day, the very person whom they almost idolized the day before; or on the great, who generally made promises which they never performed, and raised expectations which they never intended to answer: so that even vanity itself seemed heavier in the balance than all of them together. Yet to trust in oppression, or injustice and robbery, would be still more foolish and wicked. "Be not so vain as to trust to ill-gotten goods: for if your riches increase by honest means, they are not things wherein to place either your confidence and hope, or your love and joy." Bp. Patrick. (Note, Job xxxi. 24—28.) "He who is made vain and covetous by money, however honestly gotten, renders that a curse to one, which was designed a blessing to many; and drowns himself in the spring, which should have watered all around him." Bp. Horne.—The old translation of this last verse seems more literal than the present version. "Trust not in oppression, nor in robbery: be not vain: if riches increase, set not your heart thereon." According to the construction of the pointed copies of the Hebrew Bible, the verse seems more properly divided thus: "Trust

V. 11, 12. God had solemnly declared, as it were, once for all, and the Psalmist had repeatedly heard it; (Note, Job xxxiii. 14—18;) or he had “heard these two things;” that power and mercy belong to God. ‘So that the wicked ‘shall feel thy power, and the godly thy mercy.’—The Lord can punish and destroy, he can save and bless, as he pleases: all created power is from him, and limited by him; and no creature can do more harm or good, than he is pleased to appoint, or permit. (Note, Matt. vi. 13.) Mercy also belongs to him: and his recompensing the defiled and imperfect services of believers, and blotting out all their transgressions for the Redeemer’s sake, and so punishing none but the unbelieving and impenitent, is a full proof of his abundant mercy, and an encouragement to trust in him. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. xxxiv. 5—7. Rev. xxii. 10—12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

The lively believer, conscious of sincerity, can without hesitation avow, “Truly my soul waiteth upon God.” From the Lord, “his Defence and Salvation,” he expects present safety and eternal felicity; he considers all creatures as instruments in his hands; and he waits for promised blessings in the path of duty, and in the use of appointed or allowed means. (Notes, Matt. iv. 3—7.)—Yet, however blamelessly he may conduct himself, he must expect a measure of the same enmity, with which the world treated his Saviour; when every device was framed, every deceit used, and every slander propagated, to “cast him “down from his excellency.” But the doom of David’s persecutors, and of the crucifiers of Christ, may be expected by all, who endeavour to tempt his people to sin, or to vilify their characters: and none will be punished more severely, than those who deceive men with “good “words and fair speeches;” (Note, Rom. xvi. 17—20;) who “delight in lies,” who “bless with their mouth, but “curse inwardly.” Let us however, having fairly warned and expostulated with such infatuated persons, wait only upon God, and expect all our happiness from him: then shall we not “greatly be moved,” either to anger, to pride, or to despondency, by the malice or flattery of the ungodly: nay, when our faith grows strong, we shall be confident of not being moved at all to our real hurt: and meditation and prayer are blessed means of invigorating faith and hope. (Notes, Acts xx. 22—24.)—When we are rendered joyful and bold, in reliance on God under peculiar trials, we have an important advantage in exhorting our brethren to similar confidence. We may and ought to “trust in him at all times,” in persecution, temptation, affliction, and at the approach of death: for this is our privilege, and honourable to God, and it will lead us to “pour out our hearts before him;” laying open all our fears, sorrows, and wants, as to our bosom Friend; (Note, 1 Sam. i. 12—16, v. 15;) and making him our Refuge from every danger and foe: and we shall renounce other confidences, that we may singly depend on him. Those who refuse to do this, will find at length, that their dependence on men, whether on the many or the great, will terminate in disappointment and shame: and woe be to those who trust in iniquity and oppression; who accumulate wealth by evading good laws, or oppressing under the colour of bad ones, or setting all law and justice at defiance; while the miseries of multitudes ripen individuals for the vengeance of heaven. Indeed reliance on increasing riches, however obtained, is idolatry, and totally inconsistent with the life of faith.—Yet the idea of increased wealth is associated with that of augmented felicity, in almost every human heart: and it is extremely difficult to possess riches without trusting in them and setting the heart upon them. (Note, Matt. xix. 23—26. P. O. 23—30.) The true and consistent believer, however, receives all from God; and uses it to his glory, as a steward who must render an account. (Notes and P. O. Luke xvi. 1—13.) These things God has spoken, and we have heard: may we then never forget that power belongeth only to him: may we trust in his mercy and grace; and abound in his work, expecting a gracious recompense from him alone!

NOTES

PSALM LXIII. Titlc. It is generally and probably supposed, that David composed this most fervent and devout Psalm, when pursued by Saul in the deserts of Judah. (Marg. Ref.) Some, however, think that it was written at a later period; namely, when he fled from Absalom, and before he passed over Jordan. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv.)

and his worshippers at the sanctuary, seems to have affected his body, as well as his soul; perhaps spoiling his rest and appetite, and impairing his health and vigour. (Notes, xlii. 1—3. lxxxiv. 1—3.)—He resolved, however, having chosen the LORD for his God, to seek him early, diligently, and with decided preference.—‘The true Christian dedicates to God ‘the sweet hour of prime.’ He ‘opens the eyes of his understanding together with those ‘of his body, and awakes each morning to righteousness. ‘He arises with an inextinguishable thirst after those comforts which the world cannot give; and has immediate ‘recourse, by prayer, to the Fountain of the water of life, ‘ever longing to behold the divine power and glory in the ‘sanctuary above, of which he has been favoured with ‘some glimpse, in the services of the church below.’ Bp. Horne.—Many explain the words, “To see thy power “and glory, &c.” of the ark, which was the symbol of the Lord’s powerful, glorious, and gracious presence with his people. But the ark itself was concealed from sight; nor does it appear that, in the days of David, there was in general any external display of the divine glory at the sanctuary. It may therefore be supposed, that he referred to the internal and spiritual views, which, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, he had experienced of the perfections and glory of God, while attending on those ordinances; which both commemorated the wonderful works of the Lord for his people Israel, and typified the salvation of the promised Redeemer. These contemplations and discoveries, had often excited his admiring and adoring love and gratitude, and animated his confidence and joy in God; which made him regret exceedingly the loss of such pleasant and profitable opportunities. This enjoyment of the love of God, as an anticipation of heavenly felicity, he valued more than life itself; and therefore he was fully determined to employ himself, and all his powers of body and soul, in praising the Lord, as long as he lived, and wherever he was driven; (Notes, li. 12, 13. cxlv. 1, 2. cxlvi. 2;) confidently expecting, that the sweet experience which he recollected, would thus be renewed to him, even if banished from the outward means of grace. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. ‘The remembrance of thy favour is more sweet ‘unto me, than all the pleasures and dainties of the world.’—The Psalmist waited for the pleasure of communion with God, with more ardent desire, than any epicure ever anticipated the enjoyment of sensual pleasure; and the remembrance of God, during the night, cheered his soul, when dangers or cares disturbed his rest. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Cant. i. 4.)—Can any candid man read this Psalm, and then speak of true devotion, as merely intellectual, a dispassionate exercise of the understanding, without any warm emotions or vehement affections of the heart? Weighed in the balance of such phlegmatick Christians, the man after God’s own heart must be numbered among enthusiasts: for, though his devotion was most rational, it certainly was most fervent and enraptured; and in fact the more rational on that very account.

V. 6—8. David’s recollection of past protection and deliverance, which occupied his thoughts as he lay sleepless in his bed, during the watches of the night, encouraged him, not only to rely on the power, truth, and love of God, in his extremest dangers, but to rejoice in this confidence under his sharpest afflictions.—His soul cleaved unto God, as the child clings about its kind parent, when alarmed or in pain; and “followed hard after him,” earnestly seeking nearer communion and conformity; being upheld by the power of divine grace, in thus pressing forward in his heavenly course. (Note, lxxiii. 23—28.)—The fervour of David’s devotion, whether pouring out his soul in earnest prayer, with vigorous exercises of faith and hope; or celebrating the praises of God with admiring love, joyful gratitude, and glowing zeal for his honour and glory; seems especially to have procured him the honourable distinction of “the man after God’s own heart.”—The following verses from Dr. Watts well support the animation of the leading parts of this exquisitely beautiful psalm:

With heart, and eyes, and lifted hands,
 For thee I long, to thee I look;
 As travellers, in thirsty lands,
 Pant for the cooling water-brook.

With early feet I love t’ appear
 Among thy saints, and seek thy face;
 Oft have I seen thy glory there,
 And felt the power of sov’rign grace.

Nor fruits nor wines that tempt our taste,
 Nor all the joys our senses know,
 Could make me so divinely blest,
 Or raise my cheerful passions so.

My life itself without thy love,
 No taste of pleasure could afford;
 ’Twould but a tiresome burthen prove,
 If I were banish’d from the Lord.

Amidst the wakeful hours of night,
 When busy cares afflict my head,
 One thought of thee gives new delight,
 And adds refreshment to my bed.

I’ll lift my hands, I’ll raise my voice,
 While I have breath to pray or praise;
 This work shall make my heart rejoice,
 And spend the remnant of my days.

V. 9—11. The Psalmist while employed in these devout exercises, clearly foresaw the disgraceful end of his persecutors. They would perish and go under the earth, as if swallowed up by it, with Dathan and Abiram; (Note, Num. xvi. 28—34;) or, falling by the sword, they would be left unburied, for food to the foxes with which the land abounded. This was probably the case with many, who fell at Gilboa.—He also foresaw himself, as advanced upon the throne, to be king of Israel; and as rejoicing in God, and not in his outward dignity, or the ruin of his enemies: while every one, who cordially sware allegiance to him, or who, as worshippers of God, swore with solemnity by his name, would glory in the advancement of his servant; and all who falsely accused him, or attempted to deceive him, would effectually be confuted and silenced. (Marg. Ref. z—b.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The true believer is convinced, that nothing in this world can satisfy the desires of his immortal soul; and he therefore expects happiness from the eternal God, as his God and Portion. (Notes, Deut. xxxiii. 27—29.) When his soul is in a healthy and prosperous state, an inextinguishable thirst after the discoveries of the glory of the Lord, and the experience of his grace and love, lead him to seek him early, every day, with the best of his time and the prime of his affections. He likewise greatly values publick ordinances; and when confined from them, or constrained to live among those who know not God, he regrets his loss; feels as one banished into a parched wilderness; and, with a mixture of pleasure and pain, recollects, how he “has seen the power and glory of God in “his sanctuary.” (Note, xlii. 4, 5.) This uneasiness, to which he is occasionally liable, arises from the same source as another part of his experience, which is habitual, especially when faith and hope are most in exercise: the world itself appears to him a weary desert, and he longs for the joys of heaven, of which he has had some foretastes in the ordinances of God on earth. Yet, even in this wilderness wells of salvation are opened: (Note, Is. xii. 3:) his gracious thirst is in part allayed: and the want of stated means of grace sometimes excites more vigorous desires, and more earnestness in waiting on God in secret. The believer in this frame of mind values the loving kindness of God more than life; and is even willing to depart hence that he may fully enjoy it. (Note, Phil. i. 21—26. P. O. 21—30.) This foretaste and prospect tune his heart and lips to praise the Lord, and to rejoice in the midst of tribulation: and he desires, as a sweet solace during his weary pilgrimage, “to bless the LORD while he lives, and

“to lift up his hands in his name.”—Then the pleasures of the world lose their attraction: “for his soul is satisfied, as with marrow and fatness,” while joyfully praising and thinking upon God: and such contemplations at once excite his gratitude, increase his confidence, and animate him in seeking conformity and nearness to the Lord; aspiring after still greater attainments, as feeling himself upheld by the power of the Almighty.—To mount with David towards heaven, in these exalted strains of devotion and zeal, should be our holy ambition: true Christians can in some measure, and at some times, appropriate his emphatical language; but, alas! we too commonly have to complain, “that our souls cleave to the dust.” (Note, cxix. 25.) Let us then be more instant in prayer, that we may be quickened according to his word of promise.—The enemies of such Christians, as have been feebly described, are also enemies of Christ our King: present disgrace and eternal ruin will be their certain doom, if they persist in their enmity; and the lies, with which they blaspheme the Redeemer, or slander his people, or deceive one another, shall be silenced in anguish and despair. But our King having now entered upon “the joy set before him,” all who bow before him, and swear fealty to him, shall rejoice and glory in God with him; and obtain an honour and happiness infinitely superior to that of the most exalted throne on earth. And if the Israelites had reason to rejoice in their king; how much more should we glory in our “King of righteousness and peace!” (Note, Heb. vii. 1—3.)

NOTES.

Horne. (Notes, lv. 4—8. lvi. 3, 4. Acts xviii. 9—11.)*

V. 2, 3. It is probable, that the secret consultations of Saul and his courtiers against David, and the deceitful and violent measures which they adopted in order to destroy him, gave occasion to this Psalm.—Open reproaches and false accusations wound like a sword in close fight:

V. 4, 5. David was not only an upright character; but he was perfectly innocent of those crimes which were laid to his charge: (Notes, vii. 3—5. xvii. 1—5:) yet his enemies, not having the fear of God before their eyes, and being hardened against the dread of consequences, propagated their calumnies secretly, but very rapidly; encouraging one another, and consulting together in what way to ensnare and destroy him; fully expecting to escape detection, and acting as if God himself did not see them, or would not call them to account for their wickedness. Horne.*

V. 6. This verse may be rendered perhaps more literally, “They search out iniquities: we are consumed by that which has been thoroughly searched out: (marg.)” “for the inward part and the heart of man is deep.” Saul and his partisans searched to find out some real or apparent iniquity, which David had committed, in order to cover the malice of their persecution: and they sedulously contrived new methods of perpetrating their crimes. Their intentions, however, were carefully concealed; and the malice, dissimulation, and wickedness of their hearts, were deep and unfathomable. (Notes, v. 9. Jer. xvii. 9, 10. Rev. ii. 24—28.)

V. 7—10. While the persecutors were levelling their arrows, and about to shoot suddenly at David; God would unexpectedly cut them off; and their mortal wounds would be inflicted at once, while they were promising themselves complete success. (Note, vii. 8—13.) Their blasphemies, perjuries, imprecations, and slanders, would, as an immense load of guilt, fall on them, and sink them into destruction. (Notes, Prov. xii. 13. xiii. 3. xviii. 6, 7.) Their doom would be so dreadful, that the spectators would flee away, lest they should be involved in it: (Num. xvi. 34:) and all who heard of it would fear to imitate their conduct; be constrained to acknowledge the hand of God; and, learning useful instruction from the awful dispensation, would cause others to understand it. Thus the benefit, derived from it by numbers, would illustrate the wisdom and goodness of God, as well as his justice, in his severity towards these wicked men: while “all the upright in heart” would be glad and glory in him. (Marg. Ref.)—The dreadful imprecation of the Jews, when demanding our Lord’s crucifixion, “His blood be on us and on our children,” has indeed fallen upon them. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 24, 25.)—The destruction of Jerusalem filled the beholders with terror, and forced them to acknowledge that it was the work of God. Even Titus, the Roman emperor, confessed that he had fought and conquered by the favour of the Almighty; and the nation of the Jews, scattered through the world, affords a most instructive lesson to every land, and to all succeeding generations.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The continuance or renewal of our trials will render the repetition of the same petitions requisite: but varied expressions may often be affecting and useful to ourselves and others.—When faith in God triumphs over the fear of powerful and malicious men, our prayers are certainly heard, and final deliverance from the danger will in due time follow.—The most blameless will be reviled, and the most useful hated, by such men as took secret counsel, or made open insurrection, against the perfect and divine Saviour; and whetted their tongues, and shot their sarcasms, against him, before they shed his blood.—Such transgressors are often inwardly alarmed with the dread of consequences: but they encourage each other, till they flatter themselves with the hopes of impunity, and despise the all-seeing eye of God. Actuated by the most malignant enmity, with deep dissimulation “they search out iniquities,” that they may pretend zeal for God’s glory, while they are murdering his people: (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 57—68:) but all their malice will rebound upon themselves, and God himself will fight against them and destroy them; and all who behold their doom, especially in a future state, will reverence his power and justice in it. But it is our wisdom now to fear because of the judgments of God, and to flee from the wrath to come; to declare and consider his works, and to shun the rock on which others have split. For the righteous alone can rejoice and trust in this holy Lord God: and all who uprightly rely on his mercy, and seek to know and do his will, shall glory in him as their Salvation and eternal Portion.

NOTES.

PSALM LXV. V. 1. Some expositors think that this Psalm was composed after the famine of three years, which occurred towards the close of David's reign; when God had heard the prayer of his people, and was intreated for the land: and the concluding part of it renders that opinion highly probable. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxi. 1—14.) 'It becomes us, O God, ... to praise thee in thy sanctuary, (though we cannot worthily express, but must rather silently adore, thy incomparable excellencies;) and to pay the vows which we made unto thee in the time of our distress.' Bp. Patrick.—The old testament church waited in silent expectation for the coming of the Messiah, and the accomplishment of the promises relating to him, prepared then to burst forth into vocal praises, and to perform her vows. Zion was the centre of her worship, and the type of the true church, whence alone cordial praises are rendered by any of our fallen race. (Note, Rev. xiv. 1—5.)

V. 2. The readiness of the Lord to answer prayer, and all that pertains to "the throne of grace," and the "way of access" for sinful men, through the atonement and mediation of the Great High Priest, to the glory of the justice and mercy of God, as prefigured by the institutions of the law of Moses, with the invitations to draw near, and the precious promises to encourage men to do so, when extensively made known on earth, would induce men of all nations to come and worship him on his mercy-seat in Zion: and the answer of the church's prayer, in the coming of the Messiah, would make way for the propagation of the gospel among the gentiles; till at length all the human race shall come to God, as his suppliants. These events the Psalmist evidently predicted. Indeed all men, in every age, should be invited to come to God on the throne of grace; and if they accept the invitation, as they certainly ought to do, they will by no means be rejected. (Notes, Heb. iv. 14—16. vii. 23—25.)

V. 3. 'Nor need their sins,' (the sins of those who come to God,) 'discourage them: for thou hadst matter enough of that kind against me, to have hindered the prevalence of my prayer, if thou hadst charged my iniquities upon me. But thou hast been graciously pleased to forgive not only me, but all thy people their trans-

'gressions.' Bp. Patrick. 'O God, our iniquities stand in the way of thy mercies, and prevail strongly against all the endeavours of my reformation: but, do thou both mercifully forgive, and powerfully remedy, our offences.' Bp. Hall. 'He imputeth it to his sins, and to the sins of the people, that God, who was accustomed to assist them, withdraweth his succour.'—The Psalmist evidently experienced, as the apostle afterwards, that "when he would do good, evil was present with him:" and the mercy and grace of God, through the promised Saviour, to take away both the guilt and the power of sin, were his only support. (Notes, Rom. vii. 13—25.) Longing and hoping for this deliverance from guilt and depravity, he determined to persist in waiting on God, seeking his glory, expecting his help, and celebrating his praises.

V. 4. Here the Psalmist seems to congratulate the priests and Levites on their happiness, in being chosen to the sacred office of ministering to God in holy things, as their constant employment. But this was only an emblem of the spiritual priesthood, the chosen of God, to whom David belonged, though he was a king, and of the tribe of Judah: and therefore he joins himself with those who would be satisfied with the rich provisions of the sanctuary, the spiritual communion with God, of which the feasts on the peace-offerings were an external sign and sacramental prefiguration. (Notes, xxvii. 4—6. xxxvi. 5—9. lxxxiv. 4, 5. 8—12. Lev. iii. 1.)

V. 5. The terrible judgments, which God in righteousness inflicted upon Pharaoh, the Egyptians, the Canaanites, and the other enemies of Israel, were answers to the prayers of his people: the dreadful judgments on the Philistines, Syrians, and others who opposed David, were the same: and so were the terrible things, by which the Christian dispensation was introduced, and the foundations of idolatry overturned. 'Thou wilt declare thyself to be the pre-server of thy church, in destroying thine enemies, as thou didst in the Red Sea.—It is however evident, that the terrible judgments executed on those, both Jews and Gentiles, who opposed the establishment of Christianity, were especially predicted: because these happened at that season, when the "God of salvation" became the "Confidence of all the ends of the earth, and of them that were afar off upon the sea;" and in those regions which were called "the isles of the sea." (Is. xi. 11. xxiv. 15.)

V. 6, 7. That almighty God, who created and preserves the lofty mountains; who sets bounds to the tempestuous sea, and rules its waves in the most furious storms; who divided the Red Sea before Israel, and with it overwhelmed Pharaoh and his host; still protects his church: and, by the same power, he restrains the madness of enraged multitudes, of haughty tyrants, or combined nations, and calms their fury or crushes their power, whenever they attempt any thing contrary to his wise, faithful, and merciful designs.—Who can read these verses without thinking of Him who “rebuked the wind, and said to the sea, Peace, “be still; and the wind ceased and there was a great “calm?” and who said to the furious company that came to apprehend him, “I am he,” and “they went “backward and fell to the ground?” (Notes, Matt. viii. 23—27. John xviii. 4—9.)

People. (7) ^{לְאֻמִּים} (plural), peoples, nations.

V. 8. Several of the appearances in nature excited a fear of the divine power among the heathen: while the ordinary course of providence caused them to rejoice; even from the most eastern regions, whence the morning-sun appears, to the most western whither he retires when it is evening. The reports also of the judgments of God, on the enemies of Israel, excited consternation in distant nations; and the glad tidings of his salvation have made, or will make, the inhabitants of every land to rejoice.

V. 9. “Thou visitest the land, and causest it to desire, “and greatly enrichest it;” or, “after thou hast made it “to desire rain, &c.” (Marg.)—“The river of God,” in this connexion, evidently denotes those abundant and constant supplies of water, with which the Lord replenishes and fructifies the earth, as a large river waters the country through which it flows: but under that emblem the pouring out of the Spirit, after the ascension of Christ, and the blessed effects that followed, seem to have been predicted. (Notes, Is. xlv. 3—5. Rev. xxii. 1.)

V. 10. “Do thou water the ridges abundantly, do thou “cause the rain to descend into the furrows, &c.” This verse seems to be a prayer for the blessing.—Thus the land is made ready for the seed, after man has properly tilled it; and when he has sown the corn, the Lord causes it to grow and ripen. In like manner, while his ministers use

V. 11. ‘The herbs, fruits, and flowers, produced by the ‘earth, are...as a beautifully variegated crown, set upon ‘her head, by the...great Creator.’ Bp. Horne. Every year also is thus crowned by his bounty. Wherever the Lord passes, he scatters abundance around his paths; and the clouds, which are called his chariots, drop down fatness on the earth. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12, 13. Nothing can be more beautifully descriptive of a fruitful country, in a favourable season, than these verses: while the poetical representation of the “little “hills girding themselves with gladness;” and of pastures and valleys clothed with flocks of sheep and covered with crops of corn, exulting and shouting for joy, has peculiar animation.—The same metaphors are often used for the happy effects of the gospel, when successfully preached, especially in places before enveloped in darkness. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xcvi. 11—13. xcvi. 7—9. Is. xlii. 10—12. lv. 12, 13.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our God reveals himself upon a mercy-seat, ready to hear and answer the prayers of all, who come to him by faith in Jesus Christ; men in general are invited to come unto him, and seek his face; and in due time all the inhabitants of the earth shall become his worshippers. As the Lord fulfils his promises, the church reiterates his praises: the new-testament church renders that praise, and performs those vows, which the old-testament church engaged for, when waiting and praying for the coming of the promised Redeemer; future generations shall praise him for hearing our prayers for the predicted success of the gospel through the earth; and every believer will render him praises, as he graciously fulfils his promises. Thus “praise waiteth for our God in Zion;” and thus are “the vows performed,” which continually accompany the prayers of his people, and indeed are implied in them. And we may urge this as a cogent plea for the granting of our petitions, seeing it will redound to his glory. Nor can either the number or prevalency of those iniquities, for which we are humbled, invalidate the plea, when we come

PSALM LXVI.

The Psalmist exhorts all men to observe the works of God, and to praise him, with solemn awe and lively gratitude, 1—9. He shews how God had tried and delivered his people, 10—12. He determines to perform his vows; and declares how God had answered his prayers, 13—20.

in the Redeemer's name: because, "as for our transgressions, he will purge them away," "to the praise of the glory of his grace."—Blessed indeed is that man, whom the Lord chooses, and by his Spirit causes to approach him, in humble faith and prayer; and who, finding acceptance with him, learns to delight in his courts and ordinances, as the rest of his soul.—We may find that satisfaction in the goodness of his house, which others in vain expect from the world: and, while we see these blessings spring from his special love and choice, we may rejoice at the prospect of the eternal completion of them in his holy temple above. It is, however, only through that blessed One, who was chosen to approach unto the Father, and to abide in the true tabernacle as our Advocate, that we sinners can expect or experience this felicity: and through him, "the God of our salvation" is become "the Confidence of all the ends of the earth;" even of us Britons, who are indeed "afar off upon the sea," at a very great distance from the land, in which the sacred oracles were first given. But these blessings, communicated to mankind in answer to the prayers of his people, have been attended with terrible vengeance upon opposers: still more dreadful things will accompany the further prevalence of the gospel: and the complete salvation of the church will be attended by the eternal destruction of the ungodly. Nay, the Lord often answers the prayers of his people, with such convictions, rebukes, and corrections, as are for the time very terrifying to them.—But let us trust his power, truth, and love; and submit to his righteousness. The "strength, which setteth fast the mountains," upholds the believer: the word, which "stilleth the stormy ocean," can silence the tumult and rage of our most numerous and potent enemies: and he, who enriches the earth with such abundant and varied liberality, can neither want sufficiency nor bounty to feed the souls of his people. We should then adore the tokens of his power, in taking righteous vengeance on his enemies, and rejoice in beholding it displayed in mercy. We should, with wonder, gratitude, and praise, behold and participate the abundance, which, by the wise and kind providence of God, is diffused through the earth: and, while we see year after year crowned with the goodness of the Lord, so that the hills and valleys, covered with corn and cattle, seem to proclaim and rejoice in their Creator's praise; we should remember our unworthiness, be thankful for our portion, and use it to the glory of the Giver; admire and imitate his bounty to the indigent, as we are able, and his goodness to the wicked and ungrateful children of men; and pity and pray for those, who abuse these gifts to the dishonour of the Giver.—But these temporal mercies, to us unworthy creatures, shadow forth more important blessings. The rising of "the Sun of righteousness," and the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, that "River of God" full of the waters of life and salvation, render the hearts of sinners, which before were hard, barren, and worthless, fruitful in every good work; and change the face of nations, far more than the sun and rain do the face of nature. Wherever the Lord passes, by the preaching of his gospel, attended by his Holy Spirit, "his paths drop fatness;" and numbers of every description are taught to rejoice in him and praise him. These blessings have already been extended to many nations, which were far off: may we unite in fervent prayers and vigorous, persevering, and self-denying endeavours, that they may descend upon the pastures of the wilderness, the heathen world, and the poor benighted Jews; and that the whole earth may hear and embrace the gospel: and may all, who are favoured with the means of grace, bring forth abundantly "those fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ, to the glory of God the Father."

NOTES.

PSALM LXVI. Title. The double title, "A Song, a Psalm," is supposed by some to mean, a very joyful song of praise.—The name of David is not affixed to this psalm; and various opinions have been entertained concerning the time, author, and occasion of it; but it is highly probable, that it was written by David, when established on the throne, and made victorious over his enemies on every side.

V. 1—3. The Psalmist earnestly excites all the inhabitants of the land, (the noun is singular, though the verb is plural,) to exert their powers to the utmost, in celebrating openly and with exultation the works, and honouring the name, and making glorious, or a glory, the praises, of God: or, accounting it their honour, to glorify him who had remarkably interposed in their behalf; and had executed such terrible punishment on their enemies, that many who inwardly disliked them and their religion, being alarmed by the power of his works, had reluctantly submitted themselves, and professedly, yet insincerely, become the worshippers of JEHOVAH. This was the effect produced by the gospel in the first ages, when numbers, by the miracles wrought, and the judgments of God inflicted on the Jews and other opposers of Christianity, feigned submission to the divine Saviour, and embraced Christianity, without any real change of heart or character. (Marg.—xviii. 44. marg.—Notes, lxxviii. 36, 37. 2 Sam. xxii. 43—51, v. 45.)

V. 4. The words rendered "all the earth" may mean all the land: yet the verb is plural, and all the inhabitants are meant.—The passage, however, is not so evidently a prophecy of a more enlarged dispensation than that of Moses, as many are which occur in these psalms; yet even these were entirely overlooked by the Jews in the time of Christ. In like manner the clearest and most explicit predictions, that the kingdom of Christ shall at length be established all over the earth, are little attended to by professed Christians in general; but they will most certainly be at length accomplished. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. 'He toucheth the slothful dulness of man, who is cold in the consideration of God's works.' (Notes, xlv. 8, 9. cxi. 2—4. cxxvi. 1—3.)

V. 6. The miraculous passage of Israel through the Red Sea, which overwhelmed the Egyptians, and their secure march through the divided streams of Jordan, to possess Canaan and extirpate the inhabitants, are celebrated in this verse. All Israel rejoiced in the temporal benefits thus conferred on them; but the true church rejoiced in God their Saviour and Friend, and the display of his glory in these events. Israel, as the visible church, was considered as one body, which rejoiced and exulted on that occasion.—Moses, Aaron, and Miriam, led the song of joyful praise of Israel on the banks of the Red Sea; and transmitted both the benefits, and the grateful and triumphant remembrance of them, to the next generation. (Notes, cvi. 6—14. Ex. xv. 1—21.) Thus from age to age the church rejoiced and blessed God, in concert with those who were eye-witnesses of his wonderful works.

V. 7. (Note, 2 Chr. xvi. 7—10.) 'He observes the motions of all nations, who may learn, by the Egyptians and Canaanites, that they who contemn his authority, in vain endeavour to exalt themselves;...for they shall certainly be abased.' Bp. Patrick.

of the judges, and during some parts of Saul's reign, seemed to threaten the destruction of their existence as a nation: yet God had wonderfully preserved and delivered them; as a man's life is saved from imminent danger, or his health established after some very dangerous disease, or his steps upheld on the slippery brink of a precipice. The astonishing preservation of the Jews as a separate people, during their long continued dispersions and oppressions to this day; when it shall be crowned (as assuredly it shall be,) by their conversion to Christianity and restoration to the promised land; will constitute a still more extraordinary instance of the watchful care of Providence over that people, who in this particular may be regarded as a type both of the church and of individual believers. (Notes, Num. xxiii. 9. Deut. iv. 29—31. xxviii. 46. Jer. v. 15—18. xxx. 10, 11. Hos. iii. 4, 5.)

V. 11, 12. The Lord had, for wise, righteous, and merciful reasons, brought Israel into a net, by inducing them to go down into Egypt, and settle in that country. Their oppressors, having thus entangled them, laid heavy burdens on their loins, using them like beasts of burden. Nay, they were so powerful, cruel, and haughty, that they seemed to ride over their heads; and, having thrown them down, to trample them under foot. (Notes, cxxix. 1—3.) Yet from this situation, in which they "went through fire and water," through fiery trials, and seas and rivers, God had brought them to rest and great prosperity in Canaan. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Is. xliii. 1, 2. Zech. xiii. 8, 9.)

V. 13, 14. The Psalmist, having stirred up the people to praise God for his general mercies to Israel, avows his intention of celebrating, with sacrifices and oblations, those deliverances which he had lately received, both personal and publick; and thus to perform the vows which, in the most open and solemn manner, he had made in the season of great danger and affliction. V. 16. The psalm, being given to the chief musician, was made publick, and all might read it: but the Psalmist especially called the attention of those who feared God, or were truly pious persons, to the concluding part; as they alone were prepared to enter into the spirit of it, to derive instruction from his experience, and to glorify God on his account. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 5, 6.)

V. 17. That dependence on God, and expectation from him, and those spiritual affections, which are employed in believing prayer, are honourable to his power, truth, and love; so that he is extolled or magnified by them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18, 19. It is probable, that the Psalmist had not only been reproached with his past transgressions, but also charged with hypocrisy, and a secret course of habitual sin: but God had indeed answered his prayers, in a remarkable manner, ‘which brought along with it a testimony of my sincerity, far more valuable than my kingdom. For had I been guilty of such crimes, or entertained so much as a thought of them, as my enemies charged me withal, the Lord, who hates iniquity, would have denied me my request.’ Bp. Patrick.—The original is, “If I looked at iniquity with my heart;” that is, if I thought of it with affection and desire. He that “regards iniquity,” entertains the thoughts of it as a man does a welcome visitant. He provides for their entertainment, is reluctant to part with them; and, as far as he can safely, he seeks and seizes the occasion of practising the sin, which he thus thinks of with satisfaction. This evidences the love and dominion of sin; is inconsistent with true repentance; and, if connected with a profession of religion, it is a clear evidence of hypocrisy.—In this case God will not accept or answer a man’s prayers. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Prov. xxviii. 9. Is. i. 10—15. John ix. 27—34, v. 31.) But if the consciousness of sin in the heart, or the intrusion of evil thoughts, create uneasiness, and a desire to be rid of them; if they be like the presence of an impertinent, intruding visitant, or that of a dun to a moneyless debtor; this is an argument of sincerity in repentance, faith, and regard to God and his will; and God delights in the prayer of the upright. (Notes, cxix. 113. Prov. xv. 8, 9.) So that evident answers to solemn and particular prayers are divine attestations to a man’s integrity.

V. 20. Notes, xl. 11, 12. l. 7—15. cxvi. 1, 2.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The glorious perfections and works of God should induce all men in every land to delight in praising him, in “singing forth the honour of his name, and in making

“his praise glorious;” accounting it their highest honour thus to adore and glorify him: and nothing but human depravity prevents this reasonable and delightful employment from being as universal on earth as in heaven. But neither his exuberant goodness, nor his terrible judgments, nor the greatness of his power, can bring his enemies to more than a forced or feigned submission, except effectual grace new create their hearts unto holiness. In this way, however, great multitudes have been, by the gospel, brought to be his willing servants and spiritual worshippers, and at length all the inhabitants of the earth shall sing his praise.—It is very proper that sinners should be excited to “come, and behold the works of God, “and how terrible he is in his doing toward the children “of men:” that, observing how “he ruleth by his power,” over those who do not become his willing subjects; and how he beholds the nations, to hinder the rebellious from exalting themselves; they may see the necessity of seeking the favour of him whose wrath is so destructive; and, considering the deliverances vouchsafed his people, they may desire to share their privileges. His servants also should consider his wonderful works, that they may be excited to bless their God, and “cause the voice of his “praise to be heard:” and in redemption by the death of Christ, and the glories which followed that grand event, they have far more surprising and affecting subjects to contemplate, than Israel’s deliverance from Egyptian bondage.—The Lord not only preserves our temporal life, but maintains that spiritual life which he has communicated: nor will he suffer the feet of his servants to be moved, to their utter casting down, by any of the difficulties of their path, or assaults of their enemies. (Note, 1 Sam. ii. 9.) Yet he will try their faith, by affliction, as silver is tried in the fire; that it may be proved genuine and be further purified. (Notes, 1 Pet. i. 6, 7. iv. 12—16.) Oppressions and persecutions, and even temptations, are on this account permitted as benefits to our souls: they indeed spring from the malice of men or devils; but we must receive them, as prescribed by our God to effect his gracious purposes.—Through various convictions, conflicts, and troubles, the slave of Satan escapes from his galling yoke, and obtains peace and joy in believing: and “through “much tribulation” the believer “must enter into the “kingdom of God.”—While our praises unite with those of the whole church of God, for general mercies vouchsafed from age to age; and our prayers, for all that yet remains to be done; we must by no means overlook our own concerns. Under every trouble we should cry unto the Lord with our mouth and from our heart; and take occasion, from our distressing situation, more solemnly to engage ourselves to his service. Then he will deem himself honoured by our worship: and when we obtain deliverance, we must “pay the vows, which our mouth hath “spoken in the day of our distress.”—The sacrifice of the death of Christ has superseded the legal oblations, by which the ancient believers expressed their grateful zeal: but we must offer continually the sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving; our bodies must be presented as a living sacrifice unto the Lord, while our souls are as consecrated priests to him; and without grudging we must expend our substance “in doing good” to our brethren, and to all men as we have opportunity; “for with such sacrifices our “God is well pleased:” and the commemoration of the Redeemer’s atoning sacrifice, according to his holy institution, is especially that sacrifice of thanksgiving, which is our bounden duty.—Besides the general example of gratitude for our mercies, which we publicly exhibit; we should more particularly declare to those who fear God, what he has done for our souls, and how he has heard and answered our prayers: they alone are capable of understanding our experience, and they will be edified and encouraged by it, and will join with us in prayer and praise; and this will turn to our mutual comfort, and to the glory of God. But without uprightness in our professed repentance, faith, and love, we cannot share these spiritual privileges: if we love iniquity in our hearts, though we refrain from the gross practice of it, the Lord will reject our hypocritical supplications. But the feeblest petition of the repenting sinner, coming from a broken heart, will by no means be despised: and when we pray “in simplicity and “godly sincerity,” our requests will be evidently answered; and this will “turn unto us for a testimony,” increasing our assurance of the Lord’s love to us, and exciting our gratitude to him, who “hath not turned away our prayer, nor “his mercy from us.”

NOTES.

PSALM LXVII. V. 1—3. It is probable that David composed this psalm; perhaps on the same occasion as the foregoing.—It may be considered either as a prayer, or as a prophecy: but the whole, being in the future tense, is more naturally interpreted as a prediction, than as a supplication. Most versions indeed render it as a prayer, and in this sense it is exceedingly animated: yet it may be questioned, whether the method of explaining the language of direct prophecy, as longing and praying for the event, have not darkened the evidence from prophecy for the divine inspiration of scripture; and damped the expectations, exertions, and prayers of pious persons for the enlargement of the church. Prophecy may easily be converted into prayer for its accomplishment: but the prayers even of inspired persons must not be considered as prophecies.—The believing remnant of the old-testament church here predicts that God would continue and complete his mercies to them, and bless them, shining on them as the enlightening, cheering, fertilizing sun, and smiling on them as a loving Father. (Notes, iv. 6—8. Num. vi. 24—26.)—The effect of this would be, a general prevalence of truth and righteousness, of love, peace, joy, and all the fruits of the Spirit: and when the visible church became thus pure, united, and happy, it would powerfully conduce to its enlargement; till “the way of the LORD” would be known on earth, and that salvation, which heals the distempered souls of men, would reach all nations; and all the “gentiles would glorify God for his mercy.”—“The people “shall praise thee, O God; the people shall praise thee, “all of them.” (Notes, cxvii. Rom. xv. 8—13.)—This psalm is adopted into the liturgy of our church; and when it is read and attended to with understanding and affection, the prophecy is in part fulfilled. The substance also of these verses, as a petition, is inserted in the excellent prayer ‘for all sorts and conditions of men:’ though the order being reversed, the connexion between the purity and peace of the church, and its enlargement into all lands, is not so clearly maintained.—The coming of Christ, “the Sun of Righteousness, who arose” on the land of Israel, “with healing in his wings;” the success of the gospel in the primitive ages, and the future conversion of the nations to Christ; seem to have been predicted in the most unequivocal manner: nor can the prophecy be considered as fulfilled, while any part of the world remains in pagan, Mohammedan, or Jewish darkness; or while any part of the church continues in bondage to antichristian tyranny and superstition, or corrupted with heresy, and miserably divided, as, alas! it is at present.—Thy saving health. (2) Literally, “Thy salvation.” (Notes, Is. xlix. 5, 6. Luke ii. 25—32. iii. 4—6.)

V. 4. This is literally, “The nations shall be glad and “sing for joy, &c.” By the knowledge of God through the gospel, all peoples, nations, and languages shall certainly at length rejoice in his righteous government, and in the prospect of his righteous judgment. And the establishment of his kingdom throughout the earth, will fill the world with righteousness, and terminate all iniquity, oppression, fraud, licentiousness, and impiety. (Notes, Is. ii. 2—5. xi. 6—9. Rev. xx. 4—6.)

V. 6, 7. These verses are translated as a prediction, the rest as a prayer; yet the original is uniformly the future tense, and the language of express prediction. (Notes, 1—4.)—The increase is that which God gives, while his faithful servants plant and water; (Note, 1 Cor. iii. 4—9;

PSALM LXVIII.

David prays for, or predicts, the confusion and destruction of the wicked, and the joy of the righteous, 1—3. He praises the mercy and majesty of God, especially as shewn in bringing Israel out of Egypt into Canaan, 4—14. Under the type of the ark of God taking possession of Zion, and the prosperity of Israel, he predicts the ascension of Christ, the rapid success of the gospel, and the punishment of obstinate opposers, 15—31. He exhorts all nations to praise the God of Israel, 32—35.

for our God blesses us, when he thus prospers the work of his ministers: and we are assured, that he will do this more and more, till the remotest regions, till China, Japan, Peru, with every region of unexplored Africa, and every island of the earth, shall remember themselves, fear the Lord, and become his worshippers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The church on earth still greatly needs the mercy of God, and further blessings from him in performance of his promises. When he shines upon his people, and fills them with light, purity, and consolation, it exceedingly tends to spread the knowledge of his salvation. (Note, Acts ix. 31.)—None, except narrow-minded zealots for a party, would wish to confine the blessings of the gospel within any other limits, than the whole extent of the earth. Those who have experienced the salutary efficacy of this invaluable medicine, would have all their fellow-sinners to share their felicity: and they, who delight in praising God, would have all people to rejoice in him, and praise him with them; for his precepts are as equitable, as his mercies are abundant. Thus the examples, prayers, and endeavours of zealous Christians make known the ways of God on earth.—When the expected Redeemer came, the gospel was preached to the Gentiles, and the earth at large began to give her increase. But alas! only a small part of mankind have hitherto embraced Christianity; but few real Christians comparatively are found even in the purest Christian countries; and lamentable divisions and offences prevail even among that remnant. We have therefore still need to pray, that ‘our own God would fulfil his gracious promises, and enlarged predictions; and be merciful to his church, and bless it with increasing knowledge, purity, and love; that, every thing being removed, which tarnishes the beauty of the Christian religion, or weakens the endeavours of Christians to spread the gospel, his salvation may be diffused through all nations; that our Redeemer may establish his righteous kingdom over all mankind; that they may yield a revenue of praise and glory to his name; and that all the ends of the earth may worship him in spirit and truth, in reverence and godly fear.’ Amen.

NOTES.

PSALM LXVIII. V. 1—3. This psalm is supposed to have been written and used, when the ark was carried up to Mount Zion.—The first of these verses evidently refers to the words used by Moses, at the removal of the ark: (Num. x. 35, 36:) but the sacred name JEHOVAH, used in that passage, is here changed for ELOHIM, or God; and the future tense in the first clause is substituted instead of the imperative, the language of prediction for that of prayer. Indeed the old version, more literally than the present, renders the whole of these verses as a prophecy, “God will arise, and his enemies shall be scattered, &c.,” for all the verbs are future. (Notes, v. 10, 11. lxxvii. 1—3.)—The Psalmist looked back to the former mercies of God to Israel, and predicted further prosperity to his people, now the symbol of God’s presence had taken possession of its appointed residence among them.—The presence of God with Israel had dissipated the force and projects of those who hated him and them, as the cloud of smoke is dispersed by the wind, or as the wax is liquefied by the fire. And while the wicked had perished at his presence, the righteous had expressed their admiring gratitude and joy, in every imaginable way. Thus it had been of old; thus it would certainly be in future times; and thus the worshippers prayed that it might be, then and at all times.

V. 4. Rideth upon the heavens.] (Notes, 31—33. Deut. xxxiii. 26.) Or, as some render the words, “Rideth through the deserts,” (צִיְוֹן), as the Protector of Israel.—JAH is an abbreviation of JEHOVAH, and signifies self-existence and eternity. This name is used very frequently, in conjunction with Hallelu, forming the word Hallelujah; that is, ‘Praise JAH,’ or ‘JEHOVAH.’ (18. Heb. Notes, Ex. iii. 14, 15. vi. 2, 3.) He, who derives his being from none, but gives being to all, is engaged by promise and covenant to protect and bless his people; who on that account, as well as on many others, are called on to extol and rejoice in him.

in the sanctuary of Israel, (as typical of the human nature of Jesus Christ, his true temple in which he will dwell for ever;) was the condescending Patron of orphans, widows, and all destitute persons. Those who had lost their relations in Egypt and the wilderness, and were left as lonely individuals, were brought into other families in Israel, and settled in Canaan: the people, who had been in cruel bondage to Pharaoh, were set at liberty: but, as the surviving rebellious Egyptians inhabited a country desolated by divine judgments; so the rebellious Israelites dwelt during forty years in the barren wilderness.—The calling of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the unbelieving Jews, seem likewise to have been predicted: while the general plan of divine Providence is briefly described. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7, 8. When JEHOVAH, displaying his glory from the pillar of fire and cloud, conducted Israel in triumph out of Egypt, and through the wilderness; the whole creation appeared to stand in awe of the Creator, who thus manifested his glory, as the God of Israel.—The earth trembled, the heavens poured down impetuous showers, while the sea divided to open a path for Israel, and returned to overwhelm their pursuers. (Notes, Ex. xiii. 21, 22. xiv, xv. 1—21.)—But especially, when the people were encamped before Sinai, that mountain shook to its foundations, at the presence of Israel's God. (Notes, Ex. xix. 16—20. Judg. v. 4, 5.)

V. 9, 10. The awful displays of JEHOVAH's glory were not more extraordinary, than his gracious interpositions in behalf of his people. In order to provide for their urgent wants, "he commanded the clouds from above, and opened "the doors of heaven; and rained down manna upon them "to eat." "He rained flesh also upon them as dust, and "feathered fowl like as the sand of the sea." (cv. 40—42. Notes, lxxviii. 17—31. Ex. xvi. 13—36.) Thus they were plentifully supplied, and their hearts were confirmed, or strengthened and encouraged, when wearied with marching through the wilderness. They dwelt in the midst of their provisions: and the poorest of them were as sufficiently provided for, as if they had inhabited Canaan, when rendered most fruitful by the early and latter rains.—The word rendered "congregation," seems to mean any living thing; and to mark out in one general term, the immense multitude of living creatures, which were in this astonishing manner continually maintained. The Septuagint renders it, "Thy living creatures."—Considering the psalm as predictive and descriptive of the Ascension of the Saviour, our thoughts are naturally led to the events that followed; and many parts of it are peculiarly applicable to those events. In this view, how weary and barren was the visible church at the death of Christ! But what a gracious and refreshing rain was soon sent down upon it, in the pouring forth of the Spirit at the day of Pentecost and afterwards! What provision was then made for the poor souls, who had long waited for redemption in Israel, or who had groped in darkness in other lands! (Notes, lxxii. 1—7.)

V. 11, 12. In many instances the Lord himself "gave "the word," commanding the Israelites to march against their enemies, or to go forward regardless of them: and when he had given his people the victory, he put into their mouths the word of praise and thanksgiving. Then "great "was the army of those that published it."—The word rendered "published," is feminine: and the Psalmist seems to allude to the custom of the women in companies, joining to celebrate the successes of the nation with songs of praise and triumph, as Miriam and the women of Israel, and Deborah, and others did. (Notes, Ex. xv. 1—21. Judg. v.)—So decided were their victories, that while the kings commanding numerous and powerful armies fled, with the greatest precipitation, but in vain; the spoil which was taken was so large, that even the women who remained at home received a share of it. (Marg. Ref.)—Thus when our Lord, having risen as a Conqueror from the grave, gave the word to preach his gospel, great numbers were raised up to publish the glad tidings: opposing rulers and empires fell before them; (Notes, Rev. vi. 1, 2. xii. 7—12;) and millions have shared the blessings, who have been exempted from the persecutions and sufferings, which apostles and evangelists endured.—It is also remarkable, that the whole of these verses is in the future tense; and therefore, though properly applied, as the language of poetry, to past events, it may well be considered as prophetic likewise.—"The Lord will give the "word, &c."

V. 13. Israel making bricks in Egypt, and lodging like slaves between the rows of the kilns, or furnaces, being covered with clay and smoke, appeared very mean: but when possessed of Canaan, during the reigns of David and Solomon, they appeared in beauty and splendour; and still more so, as "they were a holy people unto the LORD."—Thus the slaves of Satan, when converted to Christ, dwell upon mount Zion: thus the Messiah ascended into heaven, attended with an innumerable company of angels; and thus he shall at length come to judge the world. (Marg. Ref. q.)—The original word (רַבְּבָיִם) does not seem to mean angels; yet they are evidently intended. The marginal reading many thousands is more literal. ‘Thou—sands of repetition;’ or ‘thousands again and again repeated.’ Among these the Lord manifested himself, as he had done “in Sinai, in the holy place.” (Notes, Ex. iii. 4, 5. xix. 16—20.)

V. 18. When the ark was placed upon mount Zion, the tabernacle was enriched with the spoils of the vanquished nations, which were there deposited for the benefit of the Israelites, notwithstanding their rebellions, that “the LORD God might dwell among them:” and of these spoils the temple was chiefly built. (Notes, 2 Sam. viii. 9—11. 1 Chr. xxvi. 28. xxix. 3—9.)—But the ascension of Christ must here be meant, who is thus proved to be JEHOVAH. When he ascended into heaven, he led captive Satan, sin, and death, which had held all men in captivity; and he received, as the recompence of his death upon the cross, all those gifts which were needful, in order to the conversion of sinners, and completing the salvation of believers: these he continually bestows on those for whom he received them; even on rebellious men, that “the LORD God may dwell among them,” as their Friend and Father. The apostle cites this passage, and explains it in respect of the gifts bestowed by the risen and ascended Saviour. (Notes, Eph. iv. 7—13.) He does not, however, take it from the Septuagint, but gives the sense in other words.—To receive a gift for another, implies giving it.—Some render the word translated “for men,” in man, as referring to the human nature of Christ.—The original name, or title, of God is here “JAH ELOHIM.” (Note, 4.)

V. 19, 20. The preceding review of the Lord’s dealings with his people, and the prophetick foresight of far greater benefits, (Note, 1 Pet. i. 10—12,) caused the Psalmist to break forth abruptly into adoring praises.—This must have had great effect, when sung by the numerous bands which attended the ark, accompanied with instrumental musick, in great variety and perfection. (Note, 1 Chr. xvi. 34—36.)—The God of salvation, day by day, or every day, heaped benefits on his people, and, as it were, loaded them with favours; and therefore it was but reasonable, that he should be praised every day.—Unto him, even God the Lord, being justified and sanctified by him, begin to look comely and honourable: and when they shall arrive in heaven, all remains of their sinful estate shall disappear, and they shall be as “the wings of a dove covered with silver, and “her feathers with yellow gold.” (Note, cxlix. 4. P. O.—Notes, 1 Cor. xv. 45—54. 2 Thes. i. 5—10.)

V. 14. When the Almighty scattered and destroyed the kings of Canaan for the church of Israel, (the dove mentioned in the preceding verse, the words being feminine,) it not only became very honourable; but was likewise so purified from sin, and adorned with holiness, that it appeared white like the top of Salmon when covered with snow. (Notes, li. 7. Is. i. 16—20.)—The generation which fought under Joshua was peculiarly excellent: (Notes, Josh. v. 2—8. xxii. 34:) and under the Judges, and in after ages, they were generally reformed, before they were delivered and made victorious.—But the original is in the future tense, and seems an evident prediction, under allusions to these past events, of the purity of the church, and the success of the gospel, in the primitive ages, and at the approach of the millennium. The nineteenth chapter of the Revelation seems to be a prophetick exposition of this verse, far more striking than any which can be found in the history of Israel.

V. 15, 16. It is supposed that this part of the psalm was sung, when the company attending the ark came within view of mount Zion.—If the former of these verses be read with notes of interrogation, the passage may be thus rendered, “The hill of God, is it the hill of Bashan? “The hill with craggy eminences, the hill of Bashan? “Why leap ye so,” (or, ‘why look ye askance with envy;’) “ye hills with craggy eminences? This is the hill which “God desireth for his habitation; yea, JEHOVAH will dwell “in it perpetually.”—The apostrophe is exceedingly animated and poetical, viewed in this light. God had preferred Zion to the loftiest mountains, as the place of his permanent residence, and the type of his true church in which he will dwell to eternity. (Notes, lxxviii. 67—69. lxxxvii. 1—6.)

V. 17. The God of Israel is here described as a mighty Prince and Conqueror coming to his palace, to take possession of his throne, with a very large army of chariots and horsemen; as his thousands of angels were a far more splendid retinue, than ever attended the greatest monarch. Thus he descended upon mount Sinai; thus he would belonged the outgoings from death. Life and death, heaven and hell, are absolutely at his disposal. The Lord Jesus is “the Resurrection and the Life.” He has “the keys of death and hell;” (Marg. Ref.—Note, Rev. i. 12—20, v. 18.) He has ‘opened the kingdom of heaven to all ‘believers,’ he has made a way for their deliverance from spiritual and eternal death; he has taken away the sting and terror of death, and made that “king of terrors” the gain and privilege of his people; he has consecrated the grave as the repository of their bodies, which he will raise at length incorruptible and immortal.—Our God is the God of salvation. (20) Or, salvations. (Notes, Is. xii. 1—3. John iv. 21—24.)

V. 21. The gifts received by the ascended Saviour, though for “rebellious man,” would not preserve such from destruction as went on still in their sins. The God of salvation, while he pardons and blesses the repenting rebel, is peculiarly terrible to the impenitent and unbelieving. (Note, Ex. xxxiv. 5—7.)—“The hairy scalp” means, the crown of the head, the principal strength, confidence, and glory of the enemy.—Christ will crush the serpent’s head. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Gen. iii. 14, 15.)

V. 22, 23. The Lord had promised to save Israel from their enemies by the hand of David: he would therefore renew the wonders which he wrought, when Og king of Bashan was slain, and when the Egyptians perished at the Red Sea.—The ascension of Christ made way for most signal displays of the Lord’s power, in spreading the gospel, and in taking vengeance on his enemies: and the more glorious prevalence of Christianity shall be attended with such slaughter of antichristian opposers, as will literally verify the words here used. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, cxlix. 6—9. Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6. Rev. xix. 17—21.)—As the verses follow the prophecy of our Lord’s ascension, these events seem more directly predicted; and especially the conversion of the Jews, their restoration to their own land, and the vengeance on those who shall oppose them. (Notes, Ez. xxxviii, xxxix.)

V. 24, 25. When the solemnity of the day was nearly finished, these verses seem to have been sung. The congregation had been spectators of the triumphant manner, in which their God and King had gone up to take possession of his sanctuary, attended with sacred musick and rejoicing. He had accepted their services; and all was so happily concluded, as to presage future prosperous days. (Notes, xxiv. 7—10. 1 Chr. xv. 16—24. xvi. 4—6. 37—43.) In like manner the prophecy of the Son of David, (the King of kings and Lord of lords,) going forth to destroy his enemies and enlarge his kingdom, is introduced by a vision of “much people in heaven, saying Alleluia; salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, unto the Lord “our God; &c.” (Notes, Rev. xix.) A scene not wholly unlike, but immensely more august, than that procession with the ark to mount Zion, which was the pledge of David’s further victories and prosperity.

My God, my King. (24) cxlv. 1.—Damsels. (25) cxlviii. 11—14. Notes, 11, 12. Jer. xxxi. 3—5. 10—14, v. 13.—The triumphant entrance of the ascending Saviour, amidst the loud acclamations of the heavenly hosts, is shadowed forth under these images.

V. 26. From the fountain, &c.] That is, ‘Ye, who ‘spring from the fountain,’ or the stock, ‘of Israel. Thus the people in companies seem responsively to have called upon each other, to bless the Lord. (cxxxiv, cxxxv. 1—3. 15—21.)

V. 27. The tribe of Benjamin, from which Saul the first king of Israel sprang, joined in this solemnity, as willingly subject to David; and, though a small tribe, descended from Jacob’s youngest son, and almost destroyed in the war at Gibeah; (Notes, Judg. xx.;) and now eclipsed by Judah whose princes supported David as his council, or by their multitudes; it manifested no jealousy or envy. Not only the rulers of the other tribes in the vicinity of Jerusalem attended on this occasion, but those of Zebulun and Naphtali which lay most remote: so harmonious was the whole nation on this occasion! (Notes, 1 Chr. xii. 22—40. xiii. 1—4.)—Thus after Christ’s ascension, rival nations and people, near and far off, thronged into his church.

V. 28. The people seem here to have addressed the king. The LORD his God had commanded all parties thus to strengthen David’s cause, and had effected their willing submission; and they prayed, that he would establish what he had by him wrought for his people, in preserving the unity of the nation, and increasing its prosperity. ‘May ‘it please thee, O God, to increase and confirm it: for, as ‘it is begun, so it must be perfected, by thee alone.’ Bp. Patrick. (Notes, cxxxviii. 8. Eph. iii. 20, 21. Phil. i. 3—6.)

V. 29. The word (הֵיכָל) rendered "temple" is also used for the tabernacle: (1 Sam. iii. 3:) yet it is probable, that David spoke this prophetically, and foretold that the temple, which was to be built at Jerusalem, would render the worship there performed so much known, that kings would bring presents and oblations to JEHOVAH, to be offered there. This was a figure of the conversion of the kings of the earth unto Christ in the latter days. (Notes, lxxii. 8—11. Ezra vii. 11—28. Is. xlix. 22, 23. lx. 4—14.)

V. 30. The same word is here rendered "company," as is before translated "congregation," but which signifies a living creature: (Note, 9, 10:) and it seems in this place to mean a wild beast.—The whole verse may be thus rendered: "Rebuke the wild beast of the reeds, the congregation of the mighty among the calves of the nations, skipping," or exulting, "with pieces of silver; scatter the people that delight in war." Bp. Horne. Some interpret "the beast of the reeds" to mean the crocodile, the emblem of Egypt; and the "calves of the nations," the objects of the Egyptian idolatry; while their "skipping with pieces of silver," is supposed to refer to the rites of their worship. As, however, David was not attacked by the Egyptians, or about to make war on them, this interpretation is not very satisfactory.—"The beast of the reed" or lance, seems to denote a warrior, fierce as a wild beast, perhaps Hadadezer king of Syria. "The multitude of the bulls and the calves of the people" were the powerful and numerous commanders, with their troops: and I apprehend the prayer is, "O Lord, rebuke them, enraged and strong as they are, till they lay themselves down for us to set our feet on their necks, and supplicate their lives, offering pieces of silver for tribute, as owning themselves subject to us. Yea, scatter the people that delight in war," as they evidently do." (Notes, 2 Sam. viii. x.) The word (הִתְחַנְּנוּ), rendered "submit themselves," means the most unreserved humiliation. It is used only here and Prov. vi. 3; where it is rendered, "Humble thyself." It is no doubt to be considered also as a typical prophecy, and a prayer of the church for a decided victory, over the most furious and haughty of her oppressors and persecutors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 31—33. The victories, gained by David and Israel over the surrounding nations, would induce even those who were more distant, and most addicted to idolatry, to come to Jerusalem, and join themselves to the worshippers of the true God. (Marg. Ref. c, d.) The conversion of the nations, in consequence of the judgments of God on the opposers of the gospel in the primitive times, and before the millennium, is evidently foretold: for the kingdoms of the earth are called upon to join in the praises of Israel; and to adore him, who rode on the heavens to the help of his people, (Note, Deut. xxxiii. 26,) and who spake with a mighty voice to them from mount Sinai.—When the Messiah ascended on high, to "the glory which he had with the Father before the world was," he sent forth the powerful word of his gospel, calling on all men to submit to him, "and honour him even as they honoured the Father that sent him."

Ethiopia, &c. (31) The Ethiopians shall hasten with their willing oblations to the God of Israel. As connected with Egypt, it is probable that Ethiopia in Africa is meant: the land of negroes. (Notes, Acts viii. 26—40.) This may encourage our efforts and prayers for the conversion of the much injured Africans.

V. 34, 35. All the glorious perfections of God, which are his "excellency," concur in protecting his church. The power which made the clouds, and rules the highest heavens, is exerted in behalf of his people and communicated to them, "out of his holy places;" the sanctuary of old, as the type of "heaven itself," "whither the Fore-runner is for us entered;" and whence especially he is terrible to his enemies; for "holy and reverend is his name." (Notes, xxix. cxi. 9, 10. cxlviii. 13, 14. Deut. xxxiii. 27—29.)—Blessed be God. (35) Notes, xli. 11—13. lxxii. 17—19. Eph. i. 3—8.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17.

When God arises to plead the cause of his people, the confederated power of those who hate him will be dissipated and dissolved; and at length all the wicked will perish at his presence. The same displays of his power and glory will rejoice the righteous; and words cannot express the cause which they have, and ever will have, to triumph in him as their unchangeable Friend, and to celebrate his praises. His condescension is equal to his majesty: he always patronizes the afflicted and oppressed; and poor sinners, helpless and exposed more than any destitute orphans, are readily admitted among his sons and daughters, and share all the blessings of that high relation.

PSALM LXIX.

David, as the type of Christ, mingles doleful complaints with fervent prayers for himself and his people, 1—21. He, as the type of the Redeemer, devotes his enemies to destruction, 22—29. He engages to praise and bless God, calls on the whole creation to join him, and predicts the enlargement and prosperity of the church, 30—36.

Indeed all the company of his chosen were once bound in Satan's chains, and employed in a baser drudgery than that of making bricks; and far more wretched and abject, than the Israelites in Egypt. But when he comes to break off their chains, and claim them for his own, he leads them forth to liberty, to victory, and to eternal glory. They are made willing to follow him, and he goes before them: heaven and earth concur in supplying their wants, and promoting their salvation: difficulties in their path only make way for their almighty Friend to shew his care of them; he guides and guards them; he feeds their souls with the Bread of heaven, and gives them the Water of life to drink: and, while he graciously prepares for the souls of "the poor in spirit," he will not withhold what is needful for their bodies or families. They reap the benefit of the Redeemer's victories; and, fighting under his banner and by his word of command, they profit by the assaults of every enemy: until complete salvation render those "white as snow in Salmon," and beautiful beyond all that is lovely in the visible creation, who once were most mean and loathsome, through the guilt and defilement of their sins.

V. 18—35.

The death of our Redeemer was the redemption-price of all the blessings which he confers on sinners, and his resurrection and ascension made way for his conferring them on mankind. When he ascended on high, our God declared his church of ransomed sinners to be his residence, which he greatly desired and delighted in; while in its exalted Head "all the fulness of the Godhead dwelleth bodily." He now reigns over heaven, and earth, and hell, with unlimited authority. In vain do kings or nations envy or oppose his sovereignty: all must submit, or be destroyed by him; and his wrath is more dreadful from mount Zion than it was from mount Sinai. Having led our oppressors captive, "he hath received gifts for" rebellious "man," which he never refuses to such as humbly sue for them; and those who partake of them become thenceforth "an habitation of God through the Spirit." The gifts of his written word, and of the ministry of his gospel, are vouchsafed to our land. He gave the word, great was the multitude of those who published it; and they have been raised up successively even to the present day: may he give commandment that thousands more may be raised up, to go forth and preach the gospel in every part of the earth! And may we,—may all the inhabitants of Britain,—profit by our peculiar privileges! If we have embraced from our hearts this proffered mercy, let us "bless the LORD who daily loadeth us with benefits." "Our God is the God of salvation:" he has quickened us when dead in sin, and will not leave us till he has brought us to glory, honour, and eternal life. But he will crush the serpent's head, and utterly destroy all those who "go on still in their trespasses:" for his mercies to his church will be attended with judgment on his enemies, till the complete salvation of the one be accompanied with the final ruin of the other.—And as our Lord and King condescends to come and dwell among his people, let us observe the tokens of his presence; and let all of every rank, age, and sex, concur in blessing his name: for union and harmony are the stability of the church.—All our strength is in and from the Lord; and if he has begun to communicate his grace to our souls, we may pray in faith, that he would daily stablish that which he has wrought for us and in us. May he speedily so strengthen his cause upon earth, that all the proud, idolatrous, and oppressive,—all that delight in war, or maintain opposition to his church,—may be scattered and brought down; that all kings and nations may share the blessings of his gospel, and sing praises to his name. May these predictions be fulfilled in their most extensive meaning, that all the inhabitants of the world may adore and rejoice in "his excellency over Israel;" and that he may no longer be terrible to any of them out of his holy places: but that all may "have grace to worship him in reverence and godly fear." (Note, Heb. xii. 26—29.) And while all unite in ascribing power and dominion unto him, may all experience strength communicated from him, enabling them to resist temptation, and to overcome every enemy of their salvation; (Notes, cxxxviii. 3. 2 Cor. xii. 7—10. Eph. iii. 14—19. Phil. iv. 10—13. Col. i. 9—14:) thus may one nation call upon another to bless the Lord, and all on earth form one general chorus, like that of angels in heaven, continually saying with alacrity and gratitude, "Blessed be God," even "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," throughout all ages, for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM LXIX. V. 1—3. It is probable that David, in great distress during Absalom's rebellion, composed this psalm with reference to his own case: but the Holy Spirit evidently spoke of "the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow." (Note, 1 Pet. i. 10—12.) Indeed it is so manifest a prophecy of Christ, that we should consider him as the Speaker in most parts of it.—In these verses he compares himself to a man sinking in the mire, while the floods of waters go over his head. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 14, 15. xl. 1—5. xlii. 6—8. lxxxviii. 6—9.) His sufferings from the hands of wicked men, from the powers of hell beneath, and from the justice of the Father, while external torment united with internal agony to enhance his distress, were thus represented with peculiar propriety. He continued to cry for help, till his throat was parched with thirst, and his eyes grew dim and failed in the agonies of death; while in perfect faith and patience, but in the extremity of conflict, he waited for his God to deliver him. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 36—46. xxvii. 46—50. John xix. 28—30. Gal. iii. 10—14. Heb. v. 7—10.) The floods. (2) מַבְּבֵרֵי אֶרֶץ אֲפֻרָּה a flood: “the water-flood” (15). (Note, Judg. xii. 1—6.)

V. 4. The multitudes who hated the Lord Jesus without a cause; nay, though his miracles of unmingled mercy merited their most grateful love; and who demanded his crucifixion, could not be numbered. The rulers of the Jews and of the Romans, who had all the power in their hands, combined to destroy him, being his enemies wrongfully. Then did he make restitution for our robbery, and satisfaction for our crimes, and restored that honour to the divine law which he had not taken away. (Notes, vii. 3—5. xxv. 2, 3. Matt. xxvii. 19—25. John xv. 22—25.)—David indeed was hated wrongfully, and in many things receded from his right: but the whole, and especially the concluding words, were far more emphatically verified in Christ. (Notes, Is. liii. 4—7. Zech. xiii. 7. 1 Pet. ii. 18—25.)

V. 5. ‘O God, the righteous Judge, I make my appeal to thee, who knowest the very worst of me; and protest that, whatever my mistakes or my wilful sins have been, which cannot escape thy sight, I never did them any injury, nor gave them cause to persecute me.’ Bp. Patrick. —The words, as spoken by David, have no difficulty: yet they may be considered as an appeal to the heart-searching God for his general integrity, as well as a confession of folly and sin in many instances.—If applied to the Lord Jesus, as spoken by him, they must be interpreted of our folly and iniquity being imputed to him; as the debt which he had not contracted, but was required to pay; the robbery which he had not committed, but was made answerable for. (Note, 4.)—Thus many expositors understand the verse: though perhaps it should be explained as the language of the type, rather than of the Antitype.

V. 6, 7. The Psalmist fervently prayed, that his sufferings might not prove an occasion of sin or discouragement to his pious brethren; because he was persecuted and reproached, not for his crimes, but for his religion. Thus St. Paul earnestly desired that the Ephesians might not faint, because of his sufferings on their account. (Note, Eph. iii. 13.)—But the case of our Lord's disciples, of those who “trusted that it was he that should redeem Israel,” while they witnessed the contempt and cruelty which he endured, and the ignominious death which he submitted to, and while he lay in the grave, seems most emphatically described. He however foretold and promised them that their sorrow should be turned into joy. (Note, John xvi. 16—22.) This indeed will assuredly be the case at length with all his true disciples; because “he suffered once for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God.” (Notes, xxxii. 6, 7. xxxv. 25—28. Is. i. 5, 6. liii. 2—6. Heb. xii. 2, 3. 1 Pet. iii. 17, 18.)

V. 8, 9. The Lord Jesus “came to his own, but his own received him not;” his countrymen called him “a Samaritan who had a devil;” “neither did his brethren believe in him,” and the inhabitants of Nazareth, where he had been brought up, attempted to destroy him: because his zeal for the honour of the law, and the purity of the worship of God, which entirely occupied his soul, and raised him above all inferior considerations; and his plain reproofs of hypocrisy and iniquity, exasperated the mercenary and worthless teachers and rulers of the Jews, and set all orders of men against him. In calumniating him, they ascribed the miracles, which he wrought by the Spirit of God, to Beelzebub; and in many ways they reproached God, in reproaching his beloved Son, who was “the express Image of his person;” for “they both saw and hated both him and his Father.”—As two apostles have quoted the ninth verse, with express application to Christ; we are warranted in explaining it as a direct prophecy of him, or even as his words. (Note, lxxxix. 50, 51. John ii. 14—17. vii. 3—10. Rom. xv. 1—3.)—Yet the usage which David experienced from his son Absalom, his relations, his counsellors, and his subjects, chiefly because of his zeal for the honour of God and true religion, rendered him a striking type of Christ in this respect, and doubtless occasioned this complaint. (Note, xxxi. 10—13. lxxxviii. 6—9. Job xix. 5—22. Jer. xv. 15—18.)

a “man of sorrows.” “In the likeness of sinful flesh,” and as a poor man, he appeared in the habit of humiliation, as if he had been a penitent in sackcloth. He wept, and fasted, and prayed; and he was despised and reproached for it. He was called “a Samaritan who had a devil,” “a Nazarene,” and “this deceiver;” and he was made a by-word and a proverb to the people. (Marg. Ref. b—d.) The chief priests and rulers, who sat as judges in the gate, with deliberate malice conspired his death: and the very drunkards profanely made songs of him, and diverted themselves amidst their intemperate revels, by reviling and ridiculing him. (Notes, xxii. 7, 8. xxxv. 15, 16. Dan. v. 1—4. Hos. vii. 5—7. Matt. xxvii. 27—31. 39—44.) Something of this kind had befallen David; but Jesus was far more derided and abhorred.—The Septuagint render the first clause in these verses, “I bowed down my soul with fasting.”—The word chastened is not in the original, and seems not so well to suit the case, as afflicted, or humbled, would have done. (Note, xxxv. 13, 14. cix. 22—24.)

V. 13. An acceptable time.] Or, A time of good will, or special favour. “Knowing, that albeit I now suffer trouble; yet thou hast a time wherein thou hast appointed my deliverance.”—“I commend myself with the greatest earnestness unto thee, O LORD; who now that I am so despicable, wilt think it, I hope, the fittest time to be favourable to me.” Bp. Patrick.—When the Redeemer was enduring his extremest sufferings, that he might glorify God and save the souls of his people, it was an acceptable time for his prayers in behalf of himself and them. Through him it is “an acceptable time” for our prayers, when his gospel is preached to us, and his Spirit is striving with us. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xlix. 7, 8. 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2. Heb. v. 7—10.)

The truth of thy salvation.] The faithful promises assuredly to be fulfilled to all, who embrace them in genuine faith, and plead them in prayer. (Note, John i. 17.)

V. 14, 15. The clause, “Let me be delivered from them that hate me” (14), explains the meaning of the figurative language in these verses, and in the beginning of the Psalm. (Note, 1—3.)—They contain the prayer and expectation of the Redeemer in the depth of his humiliation, when his enemies and sufferings seemed about entirely to overwhelm him: but he knew that his soul would not be left in the place of separate spirits, nor his body in the grave to see corruption; but that his resurrection and exaltation would make way for him to accomplish his purposes of love. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xvi. 8—11.)

V. 16—20. To understand these verses, and be suitably affected with them, it is peculiarly necessary to compare them with the history, given by the Evangelists, of our Lord’s agony in the garden, and his sufferings on the cross.—In the garden, “his soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death,” and “being in an agony he prayed more earnestly:” but so far from having any one to condole with him or comfort him, the apostles themselves “could not watch with him one hour.” Then, having been betrayed by Judas, denied by Peter, and forsaken by all, he was nailed to the cross, surrounded by his cruel enemies, who reproached and insulted him to the utmost; and in this extremity he exclaimed also, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me.” He had not at this crisis the comfort of his Father’s manifested loving-kindness, which he knew to be good, yea better than life: but “he hid his face from him.” And while he suffered for sinners, that the “multitude of God’s mercies” might be shewn to them, he was excluded from mercy; men shewed him no mercy, and he was smitten with the sword of divine justice. But he prayed “with strong crying and tears;” and he was heard speedily, and rescued from his foes and from death. (Marg. Ref.—Neb. v. 7.)

V. 21. The word, rendered “gall,” signifies any thing either poisonous, or exceedingly bitter. (Note, Deut. xxix. 18. Jer. viii. 14—16. Acts viii. 18—24, v. 23.)—The literal accomplishment of this verse, in the case of our Lord, is one instance out of many, of the particularity with which the circumstances of his passion were described, by “holy men of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.” (Preface to Psalms, 1 page, Note, xxii. 16—18.) But the vinegar and the gall were but a feeble emblem of that bitter cup which he exhausted, that we might drink

V. 22—28. Some commentators read this awful passage entirely in the future tense, as a prediction and not an imprecation: but most of the verbs are in the imperative; and the apostles quote from it as an imprecation. (Notes, Acts i. 20—22. Rom. xi. 7—10.) If we consider the whole as the language of Christ, denouncing the doom of his implacable enemies, and as recorded for a warning to others; no reasonable objection can be made to this interpretation: for in reading them, we only assent to the justice of the sentence. (Note, Deut. xxvii. 15.)—As our example, Christ on the cross prayed for his crucifiers; and his prayer was answered in the conversion of numbers of them: but, being exalted upon his throne, he asks of the Father, and receives from him, authority to break in pieces with his iron rod all obstinate opposers, as well as to save all humble supplicants. (Note, ii. 7—9.)—The case of the Jewish nation in particular, is here prophetically described. Not only were their temporal advantages made an occasion of mischief to them: but, depending on those sacrifices and institutions which were originally appointed for the good of their souls, and ensnared in their own counsels, they persisted both in enmity to Christ, and in resistance to the Romans. Being shut up in Jerusalem, when they were assembled to eat the passover, “their table” “became their snare:” infatuated beyond all example, and disunited among themselves, the horrors of intestine massacres weakened and terrified them: at length the Romans, the instruments of the Lord’s indignation, got possession of the city with most dreadful slaughter, destroyed the temple, (the palace here mentioned, 25, marg.) and desolated their city and habitations, so that none of them were left to dwell there. The remnant of the nation were excluded the church, and left in judicial darkness to “add iniquity to iniquity,” without obtaining an interest “in the righteousness of God.” Thus they have been blotted out of the register, in which the people of God were enrolled, and were no longer “written among the righteous:” and all this was laid on them for rejecting and crucifying the Messiah, with the most determined contempt and cruelty.—The twenty-fifth verse is applied by St. Peter to the traitor Judas, “who was guide to them

“that took Jesus;” and thus a proper representative of the apostate but hypocritical nation, which as with one voice demanded, even while celebrating the passover, the crucifixion of their Prince and Saviour.—But, the original word rendered habitation, meaning a palace, the destruction of the temple, the pride of the nation, seems also predicted: and when our Lord said, “Your house is left unto you desolate,” he may be supposed to have referred to this passage. (Note, Matt. xxiii. 37—39.)—The twenty-second Psalm, after predicting the sufferings of Christ, closes with the triumphs of his gospel; (Notes, xxii. 19—31;) but this first denounces the ruin of his enemies. Some render the words, translated “Add iniquity unto their iniquity;” “Add punishment to their iniquity:” and the marginal references will shew, that to be given up to wickedness is often the punishment, in awful justice, awarded to obstinate transgressors. (Notes, v. 10, 11. cix. 6—20.)—“It were to be wished,” says Bp. Horne on the twenty-sixth verse, “that the sorrows of the penitent, when wounded with a sense of sin, never subjected him to the scorn and contempt of those who would be thought ‘Christians.’”

V. 29. xl. 17. Note, xxii. 4—6, v. 6.—Let thy salvation, &c. Or, “Thy salvation, O God, shall set me up on high.” (Notes, lxxxviii. 1, 2. xci. 14—16.) Thus the Saviour, in the depth of his passion and humiliation, anticipates his exaltation “far above all heavens, that he might fill all things.” (Notes, Eph. i. 15—23. Phil. ii. 9—11.)

V. 30, 31. ‘Here, as in the twenty-second, and many other Psalms, the scene changes from sorrow to joy; from a state of suffering to one of triumph; from the passion to the resurrection.’ Bp. Horne.—The praises of the great Redeemer and of his redeemed church; and indeed his whole work, with the eternal glory thence redounding to the God of salvation; are far more acceptable to him than the sacrifices of the law ever had been in themselves: but when the Jews rejected Christ and preferred their sacrifices, these, even though clean animals offered according to the law, became abominable; being a declaration of their unbelief, and their refusal to “submit to the righteousness of God.” (Notes, xl. 6—8. l. 7—15. 22, 23, Is. lxvi. 3, 4. Heb. x. 5—10. 26, 27.)

(Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 10, 11. Is. lv. 6—9.)

V. 33. His prisoners.] Those who are bound in prison, as enslaved to sin and condemned for their crimes, when they are alarmed, and stirred up to seek deliverance, shall not be despised; but on the contrary, through the Redeemer's intercession, shall be brought into "the glorious liberty of the children of God."—Some explain the words, of those who were cast into prison, by such as persecuted the preachers of the gospel and those who followed them; but the figurative meaning seems far more suitable to the general tenour of the Psalm, and indeed to that of the prophecies and promises of the scripture in every part of it. (Notes, cii. 13—22. cvii. 10—16. Is. lxi. 1—3. Zech. ix. 11, 12. Luke iv. 16—22. Acts xxvi. 16—18.)

V. 34. 'The mercies of God in Christ are such, that they cannot worthily be praised by any thing less, than an universal chorus of the whole...creation.' Bp. Horne. "Heaven and earth shall, &c." The future tense is used, and it is a prediction, rather than a pious wish. (Notes, cxlviii. Luke ii. 8—14. Rev. v. 11—14. xix. 1—6.)

V. 35, 36. Zion seems to denote the church at large; the cities of Judah, the several divisions of the church throughout the world; evangelical blessings being predicted under allusions taken from the then existing state of things. (Notes, Is. lx. 4—7. lxvi. 19—23. Ez. xl. 2. Heb. xii. 18—21.)—God will preserve his church, and every sound part of it, and all true Christians; continuing to them, and entailing on their posterity, the blessings of the new covenant.—Yea, all that love God shall dwell for ever in Zion, in the church militant on earth, without being finally overcome by any enemy, and in the church triumphant in heaven.—The future conversion and restoration of the Jews also were here foretold in connexion with the other blessings, which those events will introduce. (Notes, xxii. 30, 31. Is. liii. 9—12. lxv. 8—10. Jer. xxxiii. 17—26. Rom. xi. 11—15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21.

It behoves us carefully to examine, whether the things which pertain to the Lord Jesus form as important a part of our religion, as they do of the holy scriptures; and whether our judgment, experience, and affections are, as it were, imbued with them, as the word of God is in all its parts: that, while the prophecies, as compared with the accomplishment, confirm our belief that the Bible is a divine revelation; our hope may rest on the Foundation laid in it, and our conduct be influenced by the motives proposed in it.—We cannot too often be called to contemplate the scene, here again presented to our minds. We should frequently consider the person of the Sufferer spoken of; and enquire wherefore, as well as what, he suffered: that beholding the Son of God incarnate, overwhelmed by his inexpressible sorrows, bereft of comfort, seeming in vain to cry for relief, conflicting with Satan's horrid temptations, and even bearing the wrath of God for us;—that viewing him hated without cause, and apparently left in the power of cruel enemies, treated as a stranger and an alien by his brethren and people; reproached, insulted, derided, condemned by the rulers, and made the sport of the soldiers and the vilest of the multitude; betrayed, denied, or forsaken by his disciples; nailed to the cross, and mocked, when athirst, with vinegar mingled with gall to drink:—that meditating, I say, on these scenes, we may be led to deeper humiliation for sin, to a greater admiration of the justice and mercy of our God, a higher valuation of our immortal souls, a clearer conviction of our danger, and the vanity of every other dependence, except on his great atonement; to a fuller perception of our infinite obligations to our gracious Redeemer, and a more lively gratitude and love constraining us to live to his glory. Let us further learn hence, to expect the enmity of the many and the mighty, of our relatives, and of those whom we have most served. We may perhaps plead that they "hate us wrongfully and without cause:" but our foolishness and our sins are not hid from God; and alas! they too often appear to man, and give malice that occasion which it sought against us. We need not, however, be discouraged, when reproached and put to shame for the Lord's sake; if our zeal for the truths, precepts, and worship of God, in some small measure resembling that of our Redeemer, should disgust and exasperate our neighbours, and make our former friends treat us as strangers; if those, whose words and works reproach the Lord, should despise and revile us for his sake; if even judges and rulers should speak against us; and "drunkards make songs of us," and turn our godly sorrow, our tenderness of conscience, our deadness to the world, and even our prayers for them, into derision and mockery. Whatever deep waters of affliction or temptation we are sinking into; whatever floods of trouble, or of ungodly men, seem ready to overwhelm us; we should persevere in prayer, and in waiting on our God to save us; though we be weary, and as it were hoarse, with crying for help, and our eyes be ready to fail with looking for deliverance: and the more men despise and desert us, the more earnest should be our cries unto the Lord to help and comfort us. Such extremities will be found acceptable times of approach to God,

PSALM LXX.

David prays for speedy help, to the confusion of his foes, and the triumph of the righteous, 1—5.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, ^a to bring to remembrance.

if we plead with him the multitude of his mercies, and the truth of those promises, which secure the believer's salvation: but we should in these emergencies remember others, who seek the Lord; and pray for them, that they may not be ashamed or discouraged, through our afflictions, or our misconduct.—He who brought the Redeemer from the grave, and exalted him above all his enemies, will hear those who come in his name: he will deliver them out of temptation and affliction; and with his refreshing loving-kindness he will turn unto them and comfort them, and that speedily; and he will at length receive their souls, and raise their bodies from the grave, and thus rescue them from every enemy. Indeed reproach and contempt are hard to bear, and often fill our hearts with heaviness; and we may, at some times, look in vain for compassion or comfort from our fellow-creatures. But the Redeemer exhausted that cup of wrath, which contained nothing but vinegar and gall; and he will infuse sweetness into all our sorrows. We need not therefore fear suffering with him, or for him, and should look to him, “lest we be weary and faint in our minds.”

V. 22—36.

In this our day especially “in this acceptable time,” “while it is called to-day,” we ought to fear coming short of the salvation set before us; and lest any of us should suffer, as the enemies of Christ, from his awful indignation. For many, besides the nation of the Jews, have had their table made their snare, and the things which should have been for their welfare, a trap to them; because they have opposed, or neglected his salvation: many are given up to judicial blindness, and to desperation: the hot displeasure of God pursues them from their habitation on earth; and, being “driven away in their wickedness,” they “add iniquity to iniquity,” and that for ever: for they are “blotted out of the book of the living, and are not written among the righteous.” Let us then fear lest this should be our case, and be careful not to “persecute those, whom God hath smitten; or to speak to the grief of those, whom he hath wounded.” Let us call upon the Lord without further delay, and persist in calling upon him, as on the “throne of grace,” “waiting to be gracious:” and then, though we be not only poor and sorrowful, but guilty and defiled, “the salvation of God will set us up on high.” And not only the atonement of the Redeemer, but the praises of the redeemed, who “magnify the name of the LORD with thanksgiving,” are more pleasing to him “than bullocks with horns and hoofs.”

3 Let them be turned ^e back for a reward of their shame, that say, ^f Aha, aha.

4 ^g Let all those that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee: and let such as love thy salvation say continually, Let God be magnified.

5 But ^h I am poor and needy: make haste unto me, O God: thou art my Help and my Deliverer; ⁱ O LORD, make no tarrying.

The humble will perceive and rejoice in these encouraging truths; and the souls of those, who seek the Lord according to this blessed gospel, shall live for ever. Through our exalted Advocate, he will hear the prayers of those who have been the prisoners of Satan, when they long for liberty and salvation; and he will not despise the poorest or the most guilty, who come to “trust in him.” “Let then heaven and earth praise him, the seas and every thing that moveth therein:” for God will protect and save his church, and enlarge her borders; that his people “may dwell there, and have it in possession.” He will bless them and their children after them; “a seed shall serve him” on earth, and his servants shall inherit his heavenly kingdom; and those who love his name, shall dwell before him for ever. “He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all; how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?”

NOTES.

PSALM LXX. V. 1—5. (Notes, xl. 13—17.) This Psalm is, for substance, the same as the concluding verses of the fortieth Psalm; yet there are verbal alterations in every part of it, though none that materially affect the sense.—Some think, that it was parted from the fortieth Psalm, (with some variation,) as suggesting general hints for prayer, to pious persons, under very afflictive circumstances.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No worldly possessions or distinctions can prevent the humbled sinner from feeling himself to be poor and needy: hence his entire dependence upon a merciful God, and his fervent applications to him on all occasions; while the proud can only pray formally and hypocritically. (Notes, Matt. v. 3. Luke xviii. 9—14.) But “the poor in spirit” have God for their Helper and Deliverer; and shame must be the portion of all who seek after their souls, desire their hurt, or rejoice in their calamities. Sometimes these are so ashamed as to repent and seek forgiveness: but unless this be the case, they will be treated as the enemies of Christ; because they tread in the steps of those who persecuted him, in his poverty and humiliation; and hate his image and his cause in his poor disciples. But those who “seek the LORD,” and “love his salvation,” have the “prayers of all the people of God on earth, and the intercession of Christ in heaven, in their behalf. Joy and gladness will therefore be vouchsafed them, and they will eternally magnify the God of their salvation.

NOTES

PSALM LXXI. V. 1. The name of David is not prefixed to this beautiful Psalm: yet there can be no doubt that he wrote it during Absalom's rebellion; and probably at the crisis when he heard of the sanguinary counsel, which Ahithophel had given respecting him. (Notes, 2 Sam. xvii. 1—4. 17—21.)

V. 2. In thy righteousness.] "It is a righteous thing" with God to recompense tribulation to those that trouble "you, and to you who are troubled, rest" and deliverance. (Note, 2 Thes. i. 5—10.) This kind of appeal to the justice of God, in David's circumstances, seems by much the most natural interpretation. (Notes, vii. 1—11. xvii. 1—3. cxliii. 1, 2.) But some suppose the faithfulness of God to his promises to be meant; and others explain the words, as spoken of that "righteousness of God, which is unto all and upon all that believe." (Notes, 16. Rom. iii. 21—26.)

V. 3. The idea of an impregnable fortress, in a country liable to be invaded by powerful enemies, with a ready admission on any emergency, and habitual residence in it, admirably illustrates the believer's privilege of access to God at all times; with the security and confidence which spring from a due improvement of it. (Notes, xxxi. 2—4. xci. 1, 2. 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3. Prov. xviii. 10, 11. Is. xxxii. 1, 2.)—The promises, which God had made to David, and to his posterity by Solomon, were such express declarations of his purposes, as amounted to "a commandment to save him," which all the servants of God in heaven and earth ought to concur in performing. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. The unrighteous and cruel man.] That is, Ahithophel. (Marg. Ref. h.)

V. 5, 6. David was conscious that he had trusted God from his early youth: and the recollection of the numerous instances, in which the Lord had answered his expectations and prayers, through a long course of years, not only encouraged his confidence, but animated him to praise and gratitude amidst all difficulties.—In this he was a feeble type of Christ, who, with infinite condescension, passed through the state of childhood and youth for our sakes, and without the least spot of sin. (Notes, xxii. 9, 10. Is. xlix. 1, 2. P. O. Luke ii. 41—52.)

V. 7. Numbers no doubt wondered that David should meet with such uncommon afflictions, and perhaps suspected him of some prodigious wickedness, which he contrived to hide from men: (Note, Job ii. 12, 13:) many might wonder at his unabated confidence in God, and be anxious to know, whether he would be delivered, or not: and others might be surprised to see him protected and comforted under his afflictions, and astonished especially at the wonderful deliverances which he had experienced.—"Christ, in his state of humiliation upon earth, was a 'sign' every where 'spoken against.' ... The Christian, 'who lives by faith, who quits possession for reversion, 'and who chooses to suffer with his Saviour here, that he 'may reign with him hereafter, appears to the men of the 'world as a monster of folly and enthusiasm. But God 'is the "strong Refuge" of all such.' Bp. Horne. (Notes, 2 Kings ix. 11. Zech. iii. 8.)

V. 8, 9. The Psalmist especially prayed, that he might be delivered and comforted, in order that his mouth might be opened, continually to celebrate the praises of God, and to recommend his salvation to all around him, and all that should come after him. He had long endeavoured, with all his influence, to promote the worship and service of God; and he had been very useful to Israel: but he was not capable of such services as he had been formerly; and his rebellious son, and ungrateful people, rejected and despised his authority. And he earnestly prayed, that his sins, in the matter of Uriah, might not be thus visited upon him. (Notes, li. 11—13.) He was, however, persuaded that God, who had favoured and helped him all his life long, would not cast him off in his old age. (Notes, 17, 18. Is. xlv. 3, 4.)

spirators, while they consulted together to destroy David, may be supposed to have excused their own detestable wickedness, by charging him with many real or supposed crimes; and it is probable, they spoke most virulently of his conduct in respect of Bathsheba and Uriah. Persuading themselves, therefore, that David had, by that scandalous wickedness, forfeited the divine protection; which they could not deny that he had formerly enjoyed, when he slew Goliath, was delivered from Saul, and made victorious over the surrounding nations; they concluded that God had forsaken him, and that they might proceed in persecuting him, with confidence of success; for there was now no Deliverer. (Notes, iv. 2. xli. 4—8. xlii. 9, 10.) But David, while submissively enduring the correction of his heavenly Father, was conscious that he had deeply repented, and had obtained forgiveness. He was also aware, that profane contempt of God was united with enmity to himself, in the conduct of his foes: and thence he deduced arguments to strengthen his assurance, that God would for his own glory rescue his persecuted servant from his impious persecutors.—Those who consulted to put our Lord to death, and tried to find accusations against him, could not but own that he had wrought many miracles; yet when they prevailed so far as to get him nailed to the cross, they insulted him, as if God had finally forsaken him. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 39—44. John xi. 47, 48.)

V. 12. ‘O my God, who hast hitherto so wonderfully preserved me, let this their vain confidence and insulting language incline thee to make the greater speed to relieve me.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 13—15. These verses throughout are in the future tense; the language of prediction, or confident expectation, and not necessarily of imprecation. It might not be so material to observe this, if many had not taken occasion from the latter interpretation, to charge “the man after God’s own heart” with malevolence and a revengeful spirit; and to represent the Old Testament as sanctioning such a spirit, though unsuitable to the evangelical dispensation. Nay, some very pious and respectable persons have admitted charges of this kind, to a very great extent; but they are highly dishonourable to God. His perfections and commandments, his holiness, and the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit, are unchangeably the same. And there is no reason to think, that David had recorded one prayer in the Psalms, which St. Paul would in similar circumstances have scrupled. When he spoke as the type of Christ, or by the Spirit of prophecy, he might very properly either predict or denounce destruction on those, who persisted in opposing him; as the apostle says, “If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha.” (Notes, 1 Cor. xvi. 21—24.) And when he was engaged in devotion or meditation, he might, in assured faith, foresee the ruin of his own wicked persecutors, such as Saul and Ahithophel, and even pray for their confusion, as the apostle said of Alexander the coppersmith, “The Lord reward him according to his works;” being fully persuaded that he was given over to a reprobate mind, and if not restrained would do a great deal of mischief to the church of God. (Notes, v. 10, 11. xxxv. 4—9. xl. 13—15. lxix. 22—28. cix. 6—20. 2 Tim. iv. 14, 15.)—‘Because thy benefits toward me are innumerable, I cannot but continually meditate on them, and rehearse them.’ (Notes, 8, 9. 22—24. xl. 1—5. 9, 10. cxxxix. 17, 18. cxlv. 9—13. Is. xlv. 20—25.)

V. 16. The Psalmist, in the sharp and perilous contest in which he was engaged, determined to trust in the power of God for deliverance, and to “mention his righteousness alone.”—He had not deserved, from his son and subjects, the ill usage which he received from them: he would not, however, attempt to justify himself before God; but would submit, with adoring reverence, to his righteousness under this heavy trial; committing his cause to him as a righteous Judge, without the least reserve.—The Christian also goes forth to conflict with his enemies, in the strength of the Lord; and mentions the righteousness of Christ, the righteousness of God by faith, as the only meritorious cause of his acceptance: and many think David here spoke of that righteousness, as the ground of his confidence. Others interpret it of the Lord’s faithfulness to his promises: but the foregoing sense seems most to agree with the context. (Note, li. 14.)

V. 17, 18. David had early been taught by the Spirit of God the way of truth and holiness, and employed in many useful services during a long course of years; especially in declaring the wondrous works of God as the sweet Psalmist of Israel: (Note, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, 2;) and he prayed, in the language of confident expectation, that he might be preserved in his old age, till he had completed this work, and shewn more fully the power of God, and his glorious perfections and kingdom, not only to that, but to all future

19 ^a Thy righteousness also, O God, ^b is very high, ^c who hast done great things: O God, ^d who ^e is like unto thee?

20 Thou, ^f which hast shewed me great and sore troubles, shalt ^g quicken me again, and ^h shalt bring me up again from the depths of the earth.

21 Thou shalt ⁱ increase my greatness, and ^j comfort me on every side.

22 I will also praise thee with the ^k psaltery, ^l even thy truth, O my God: unto thee will I sing with the harp, ^m O thou Holy One of Israel.

23 ⁿ My lips shall greatly rejoice when I sing unto thee; and ^o my soul, which thou hast redeemed.

generations. (Note, 5, 6, 8, 9.)—The usefulness of his Psalms to the whole church, in all successive ages, is a most wonderful performance of this, whether considered as a prayer, or a prediction: for many of his Psalms, especially some of those which conclude the book, seem to have been written, and the complete arrangement of the Psalmody at the tabernacle to have been made, after this time.

Strength. (18) "Arm." Marg. (Notes, Is. li. 9—11. liii. 1.) And as Christ is "the Arm of the Lord," so the gospel is "the power of God unto salvation:" (Notes, ex. 2. Rom. i. 13—16, v. 16. 1 Cor. i. 20—24. 2 Cor. x. 1—6:) and the psalms of David especially declare this Arm and power of God, to every generation.

V. 19. The methods, by which God governs and will judge the world in righteousness, are so high that man cannot comprehend them. This is peculiarly the case, in respect of the harmony of mercy and truth with perfect justice in the mediatorial government of Jesus Christ, and the way in which believers are "made the righteousness of God in him." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxvi. 5—9. xcvii. 2. Rom. iii. 21—26. xi. 33—36. Eph. iii. 9—12. 1 Pet. i. 10—12.)

V. 20, 21. David had already been carried through many and grievous troubles; and now in the depth of his present distress, he was like one who is dead and buried: but he expected that God would revive him; and not only restore him to his former comforts, but abundantly increase them: nor was he disappointed.—He likewise seems here to have spoken as the type of Christ, under his deepest humiliation, about to die and be buried, but expecting his resurrection, and exaltation to the throne of glory, and the enlargement of his kingdom to the ends of the earth. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22—24. This exulting anticipation of the high praises, which, with heart-felt joy and gratitude, the Psalmist expected to sing to his great Deliverer and Benefactor, using every method of making them more solemn and triumphant, when it is considered as his language in the depth of distress, is worthy of special consideration; and shews the strength of his faith, the confidence of his hope, and the fervency of his piety.—The "truth," or faithfulness, of God is here mentioned distinctly, as well as his "righteousness." David had grounded his confidence on the divine promises, and referred the cause between him and his rebellious subjects to the decision of divine justice; both of which he would celebrate continually, and "with joyful lips," when he had received that merciful

A Psalm * for Solomon.

GIVE the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto ^b the king's son.

must "go forth in the strength of the Lord God, and make mention of his righteousness only."—Indeed, as old age approaches, our strength in many respects will fail us: but God will not cast off his greyheaded servants, when they are no longer capable of labouring as they have done. And his people should imitate his example, in their kindness towards such as have spent their health and strength in their service.—He indeed often favours his aged servants with peculiar vigour in their souls, when nature is sinking into decay; that their faith, hope, love, and joy, may shew to all around them, what a faithful Friend he is to his people. The experienced believer, in such circumstances, ought to speak of the perfections and works of God, to his neighbours: and, if able, he will do well to leave some testimony of his happy experience and decided judgment, upon record for posterity; to shew his "strength to the present generation, and his power to all them who are yet for to come." (Note, 2 Pet. i. 12—15.)—But God is so exalted, that it is far above our ability to praise him worthily: he has done great things, and there is none like unto him: yet "the everlasting righteousness," which was brought in, when the Redeemer had passed through his great and sore troubles, and was raised again from the depths of the earth, and exalted to the throne of glory, demands our most admiring gratitude and praise. Resting our hopes on that foundation, we may bear up under our lighter trials, and even go down with confidence into the grave: for the Lord will receive our "souls, which he hath redeemed;" and will quicken our bodies also and raise them from the dust of the earth again, and thus "increase our greatness, and comfort us on every side." (Notes, 1 Cor. xv. 50—58. Phil. iii. 20, 21.) Anticipating this final deliverance and victory, let us here spend our days, while waiting the approach of death, in praising the Holy One of Israel, with all our powers and attainments: and while we are speaking of his righteousness, and earnestly praising his name, we shall rise superior to our fears and infirmities; and have sweet earnest of the joys of heaven.

'joy, he indited this psalm, in which he recommends 'Solomon to the divine benediction, and instructs him how 'to make his people happy; ... which he carries on in so 'high a strain, in some places, that the words had not a 'full accomplishment, ... till the appearing of that great 'King, Christ, of whose ... kingdom his father David here 'prophesies.' Bp. Patrick.—"The aged monarch of Israel, 'being about to resign the kingdom into the hands of his 'son Solomon, makes unto God the request of a wise 'father for him. He asks such a portion of wisdom and 'integrity from above, as might enable the young prince 'to govern aright the people of God, and exhibit ... a fair 'resemblance of the Messiah.' Bp. Horne. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxii. 11—13. xxix. 10—19. 21—25.)—The prayer of Solomon, for wisdom to govern Israel, was evidently grounded on the instructions of this psalm, which shews how deeply he was impressed by it. (Notes, 1 Kings iii. 5—14.)

V. 1, 2. Solomon was both "king" and "the king's son," which no king of Israel had before been: and his pious father ardently desired, that "the wisdom of God "might be in him to do justice;" that he might understand the statutes and laws of God, and copy his righteousness in his administration; especially in exercising his authority to defend and redress the wrongs, and relieve the distresses, of the poor. (Note, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. Prov. xxxi. 4—9.) Thus his reign would be an apt resemblance, as it was an evident type, of the kingdom of the Messiah; of whom the whole psalm must be considered as a direct prophecy, and many of the expressions in it can be interpreted of no other.

V. 3. The peace and righteousness of Solomon's reign were visible, in the mountains and hills, covered with vines, corn, and cattle; the people quietly gathering in their abundance, and enjoying it, without fear of invasion or oppression; and the magistrates, both superior and inferior, being exact in administering justice.—Thus the Redeemer's kingdom, established in mercy, and governed in peace and righteousness, produces abundantly the fruits of holiness, in all places where it is truly established. (Notes, lxxxv. 10—13. xcvi. 10—13. xcviii. 7—9.)

V. 4—7. 'As this is true in all godly kings, so it is 'chiefly verified in Christ, who, with his heavenly dew, 'maketh his church ever to flourish.' 'He sheweth where- 'fore the sword is committed to kings; to wit, to defend 'the innocent, and suppress the wicked.'—Solomon reigned only forty years, and his kingdom lost much of its splen-dour, when left to his descendants; and even the kingdom of Judah as continued to them, terminated in a few centuries: but Christ shall reign through all generations to the end of time.—Solomon's peaceful and equitable administration was refreshing and beneficial, as the gentle showers upon the new mown grounds, or on the grass when parched by the burning sun. 'He shall not endeavour to be formidable to them, like a tyrant, whose government imitates the thunder, storms, and tempests: but condescend most graciously to the meanest; and rule them in so soft and gentle a manner, as shall make his authority no less acceptable and beneficial, than the rain is to the after-grass, or dripping showers, which fall in summer-heat, to refresh the parched earth.' Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 2. 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4.)—But the effects of the gospel of Christ, accompanied by the influences of the Holy Spirit, and of his mediatorial kingdom, are thus most aptly described. By these the distressed conscience is comforted, the barren heart made fruitful, and the beauties of holiness communicated, where before vice and deformity alone were visible. If then the righteous flourished and were multiplied in Solomon's peaceful reign; much more has this been, and will be, the effect of the setting up of the kingdom of our Prince of peace: and more especially in the latter ages of the world; when it is foretold that men "shall learn war no more." (*Notes, lxxxix. 1—4. Is. ii. 2—5. ix. 6, 7. xi. 2—9. xxxii. 16—20. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. Luke ii. 8—14. Heb. vii. 1—3. V. 8—11. Solomon reigned from the river of Egypt, and the coast of the Mediterranean sea, to the Euphrates, and perhaps to the Persian gulph into which the Euphrates runs. (Note, 1 Kings iv. 21.) The inhabitants of the desert countries which lay between submitted to him; and opposition, as it were, lay prostrate before him. The queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem with munificent presents, and all the kings round about brought tribute or gifts to him. (Notes, 1 Kings x. 1—15.) Yet this faintly shadowed forth the Redeemer's kingdom. The prophet Zechariah uses these very words in foretelling the extent of it. (Zech. ix. 10.) The wise men from the East, with their presents, first hailed the new-born King of the Jews (15). His kingdom has already been set up in many nations, and a full completion of these predictions will at length take place; when all "kings shall indeed fall down before him," as his worshippers, "all nations shall serve him."—It is absurd to interpret this of the forced submission, which even the wicked will make to Christ at the day of judgment: for how will they "serve him" by "going away into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels?" No doubt the millennium is here foretold. (Notes, lxxxvi. 9, 10. cxxxviii. 4, 5. Rev. xi. 15—18. xx. 1—6.)

V. 12, 13. 'Nor shall they be induced to these submissions so much by the greatness of his power, ... as by the fame of his justice, mercy, and compassion; (wherein he shall resemble the Lord Christ:) for no sooner shall any miserable wretch, who hath no friend in the world, implore his protection, but he shall instantly succour ... him.' Bp. Patrick.—The verses, however, far more properly express the spiritual blessings of Christ's kingdom, than any temporal effects of the very best government on earth. (Notes, x. 17, 18. lxxxii. 2—4. Is. xli. 17—20. lvii. 15, 16. lxi. 1—3. lxvi. 1, 2. Matt. v. 3—5. xi. 2—6. Jam. ii. 5—7. Rev. iii. 17—19.)

V. 14. Solomon, as a wise and good king, rescued, as a redeemer, the poor from fraud and violence; and he was tender of the blood of his subjects: he put none to death by the sword of justice, when mercy could safely be exercised; and he did not waste their blood in wars of any kind.—But the Redeemer shed his own blood to redeem the souls of his people; he does not expose them to unnecessary sufferings; and when they shed their blood for his sake, it is precious in his sight, and will be abundantly recompensed to them, and avenged on their persecutors. (Notes, cxvi. 15. Matt. xxiii. 29—36. Rev. ii. 10, 11. vi. 9—11.)

V. 15. During the course of a long and prosperous reign, Solomon received tribute from the Arabians and other nations; and those who solicited his favour brought him presents. The continuance of his life was prayed for by his pious subjects; and numbers joined them in bestowing daily the highest commendations on him. But in these things he was no more than a type of the Messiah. The ancient church from the beginning prayed for his coming: his church now prays for the success of his gospel: prayers are continually ascending through him for the blessings of his salvation: while praises and adorations are presented before him, by his people in every part of the world, yea, by all the inhabitants of heaven.—The clause rendered, “Prayer also shall be made for him continually,” is translated in the book of common prayer, “Prayer shall be made ever unto him;” and by the Septuagint, “they shall pray continually concerning him.” The original word (יְרַבֵּ) may be rendered either through him, or, on account of him: and may therefore be understood, either of the prayers offered for his coming, and the success of his gospel; or of those daily presented through his intercession, and on the ground of his merits and atonement. No doubt prayer as well as praise is daily offered to him, throughout the whole church; but this does not appear to be the meaning of the words. (Marg. Ref.)—He shall live, &c. Notes, John xiv. 18—20. Rom. v. 7—10. viii. 32—34. Col. iii. 1—4.

V. 16. A handful of corn, sown on the ridge of a mountain, the least fertile part of the country; yet producing a crop so strong and thick, that, when waving in the wind, it would resemble the forests of Lebanon; is the allusion here used, to illustrate the fruitfulness of Canaan in this favoured reign. In consequence, the inhabitants of Jerusalem would become numerous as the blades of grass. The old translation of the last clause runs thus, “the children shall flourish out of the city, like the grass of the earth.” It is a prediction of a vastly increased population, and all abundantly provided for.—The rapid promulgation of Christianity, from small beginnings, among the Gentiles as well as Jews; the numerous converts raised up, strong in faith, holy in their lives, and filled with consolation; and the continual increase of these inhabitants of the new Jerusalem, and the abundant provisions made for them, were thus, in a striking manner, typically predicted.—When two or three missionaries are sent, with “the word of the truth of the gospel,” to a heathen nation: a handful of seed corn is carried to be sown in a most unpromising situation: yet this, increasing by the special blessing of God; and the increase being as it were sown again and again, from year to year; a whole nation or continent may at length be covered with the abundant harvest, and the spiritual prosperity of populous cities amply provided for. (Notes, lxvii. 6, 7. lxxxv. 10—13. Is.

xxx. 23—25. xxxii. 15—20. Matt. xiii. 31, 32. John xv. 12—16.)

V. 17—19. These verses contain a most extraordinary prediction of Christ and his kingdom; and notwithstanding Solomon’s durable and extensive renown, they can scarcely be at all applied to him, without enervating their energy. “Behold, a greater than Solomon is here!”—The words rendered, “Men shall be blessed in him; all nations shall call “him blessed,” seem to mean, “All “nations,” while “blessing themselves in him,” shall call him blessed, or celebrate his praises. (Notes, Gen. xii. 1—3. xviii. 18, 19. xxii. 16—18.) Nearly the very words of the Lord to Abraham (Gen. xxii. 18) are here used.—Thus God alone has done most wonderful things, in blessing the nations by Jesus Christ; and he will do wonderful things.—The last clause is future, and may be exactly rendered, “The whole earth shall be filled with his glory;” being a prediction of the universal prevalence of the kingdom of Christ, and the display of the glory of God in him. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. xi. 6—9. Hab. ii. 12—14. Zech. xiv. 6—9.) To this the Psalmist and all the people added, Amen, amen. (Note, xli. 11—13. Matt. vi. 9, 10, 13.) Be it so, be it so. ‘Let the whole earth be filled with the glory of God and of Christ.’—‘Blessed, therefore, be thou, ‘O Lord Jesu, for thou art the Lord God, even the God ‘of Israel, who hast wrought such miracles of mercy for ‘the salvation of thy church: and blessed by the tongues ‘of men and angels be thy holy and glorious name; and ‘let the whole earth be filled with...thy most excellent ‘glory!...So be it, so be it.’ Bp. Horne.—Perhaps the eighteenth verse may be considered, as addressed to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus; and the beginning of the nineteenth to the divine Saviour.

V. 20. The dying Psalmist, having thus prayed for, and foreseen, his son’s prosperous reign; and having looked forward to the coming of the Redeemer, and viewed the whole earth filled with his glory; had no more to ask or to do, but to lie down and rest in hope. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1—5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Pious parents will be the more earnest in prayer for their children, in proportion to the importance of those stations, which they are likely to occupy in society, and in the church of God: and those who have faithfully served their generation, and are going to rest, will be equally attentive to the interests of posterity, especially with respect to true religion.—As it is in every way so important to mankind,

PSALM LXXIII.

The Psalmist, assured that God is good to his people, shews that his faith had almost failed, on seeing the prosperity of the wicked, 1—14. He states how he overcame the temptation in the sanctuary, by learning their dreadful end, 15—20. He, with deep humility, avows his unreserved dependence on God, and de-that rulers should be men of wisdom and righteousness, protectors of the industrious poor, and terrors to evil-doers of every degree; it becomes the duty of every man, to pray that God would give the king, and his successor, and all legislators and magistrates, his judgments and righteousness, that "they may judge the people with righteousness and the poor with judgment." And princes should be reminded by such as have access to them, especially the ministers of religion who are thus distinguished, that they are the vicegerents of God, to whom they must give an account of their authority, and that they ought to imitate him in their government. While we therefore meditate on the nature of the Redeemer's kingdom, let it be observed, that in this respect he is especially an example to all rulers, and will be followed by all such as are wise and righteous. The wisdom and justice of God, as well as his authority, are in him. He is "the King of righteousness, and of peace:" and, having once "made peace by the blood of his cross," he brings all spiritual blessings to sinners; and, by their conversion and salvation, renders them like a precious harvest springing forth in every part of the earth. The poor in spirit, the broken in heart, apply for and obtain from him peace of conscience, and that "peace of God which passeth all understanding;" but he will crush the obstinate, the proud, and the impenitent. By the warnings and encouragements of his gospel, multitudes, through successive generations, are brought to fear, submit to, and worship God: and this shall be more and more the case, as long as the sun and moon endure. His gracious truths, attended by the influences of his Spirit, distil, like the refreshing and fructifying rain upon the parched earth; and holiness, comfort, and usefulness are the never-failing effects. Thus "in his days the righteous flourish;" and, while they enjoy abundance of peace, they are multiplied exceedingly. His people are taught to behave with such equity, truth, and love; and so to bear with and forgive each other, and to follow peace with all men; that as far as his kingdom is really set up, discords and contentions cease, in families, neighbourhoods, and nations: and he defends his harmless subjects, against those who would treat them with deceit and violence. He delivers the needy, perishing sinner, when he cries unto him, from the tyranny and oppression of Satan: he spares believers, though they deserve punishment, and saves their souls from destruction; he redeems them from all their enemies, "and precious shall their blood be in his sight." Thus he becomes precious to their hearts, and love of him constrains them to live devoted to his service and glory.—The good seed of his gospel being, as it were, but a handful, sown upon the before barren mountains of the Gentile world, has already produced an immense increase of believers, fruitful in good works, to the glory of God, and the benefit of mankind: and they shall still increase more and more. His dominion has already extended very widely; many kings and nations have become his subjects; and many of his enemies have licked the dust. At length "all kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall do him service:" he shall crush the head of the great oppressor, and destroy all who withstand his cause: "his name and glory shall endure as long as the sun;" and "men shall be blessed in him," and with one consent shall call him blessed for evermore. May we then submit to his authority, and partake of his righteousness and peace: may we daily celebrate his praises, and bless the God of Israel for the wonders of his redeeming love: may we spend our days, and end our lives, praying and using all proper means in our power, for the success of the gospel, and longing for that time when "the whole earth shall be filled with his glory! Amen, and amen."

NOTES.

PSALM LXXIII. Title. This, and several of the following psalms, are ascribed to Asaph, in the same manner of expression by which others are ascribed to David: (Marg. Ref.) yet some think that David wrote them, and only delivered them to Asaph to be set to musick, or sung; while others think that another Asaph, in later ages, wrote some of them. (2 Chr. xxix. 30.)

V. 1. The Psalmist, after much consideration, and a sharp contest with temptation, thus abruptly expressed his assurance that, notwithstanding appearances, the Lord was kind to his true people, who served him in uprightness of heart.—The same distinction between an Israelite by nation, and the true Israelite, which is often made in the New Testament, is here explicitly established. (Notes, Matt. v. 8. John i. 47—51. Rom. ii. 25—29.)

V. 2, 3. (Notes, xxxvii. 1, 2. 5—8. xciv. 16—18. Jer. xii. 1—4.) 'I began to doubt, and stagger in my faith. ... The reason was, that having a just indignation against the folly, or rather madness, of wicked men, it first vexed me to see them... in a very flourishing condition; and then tempted me to think it very hard, that sober men should not equal, if not exceed them, in such happiness.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 4. Wicked men often live to old age, in firm strength and health, as well as prosperity; and end their lives without great pain: while many pious persons scarcely know what health is, and die with great sufferings. Nay, numbers of

V. 10. This verse is generally allowed to be very difficult, and a variety of discordant interpretations have been given of it.—The original may literally be rendered, “On “this account his people shall return hither, and waters “of fulness shall be wrung out to them.” “His people,” seems to mean the people of God, who, witnessing the prosperity of the wicked, and experiencing many sorrows and hardships, were tempted to “return hither,” (i. e. to the company of the ungodly,) in order to share their ease and pleasure: but the consequence in general was, that “waters of a full cup were wrung out to them;” they brought many chastisements on themselves, and were oppressed with sorrow for their guilt and folly. ‘Not only ‘the reprobate, but also the people of God, oftentimes ‘fall back, seeing the prosperous estate of the wicked, and ‘are overwhelmed with sorrows; thinking that God con- ‘sidereth not aright the state of the godly.’—The verse is in the future, and it seems most natural to explain it, as the Psalmist’s apprehension, that the prosperity of daring sinners would eventually prove an invincible temptation, and a great source of sorrow to believers. The clause, “waters of a full cup are wrung out to them,” probably refers to the cups of liquor mingled with poison, which were in those days given to criminals: but whether it denote the inordinate sorrow of tempted believers under their own sufferings, contrasted with beholding the success and indulgence of the wicked; or to the painful consequences of yielding to the temptation, and imitating those whom they envied, must remain doubtful.

V. 11. This verse is by some interpreted in connexion with the foregoing, as the language of the tempted believer, who is even induced by what he feels and witnesses, to adopt the language of the ungodly, and to question, whether God do indeed know, and take cognizance of human affairs. This interpretation rises naturally from the words: but, as it is thought by many, that pious persons cannot well be supposed to use such infidel language, they conclude that the Psalmist here returns to his subject, and that the profligates above described, and those whom they pervert, are again introduced. (Notes, 6—9. x. 2—11. xciv. 1—9.)

V. 12—14. ‘These worthless, ungodly, blasphemous ‘wretches, whose characters I have been delineating; these the wicked are so hardened in presumption, that they die without terror or remorse. (Notes, xvii. 13—15. Job xxi. 7—22. xxiv. 18—20.) The original may be rendered, “They have no bands till their death.” They are not put in chains for execution, like condemned criminals; but are let alone, till they are taken out of the world like other men.—‘There is neither pangs of body, nor remorse and ‘terror of soul, in their death.’ Bp. Hall.

V. 5. The wealthy sinner, ‘far from poverty as free ‘from disease, seems to pass his days exempted from the ‘miseries of mankind, without labour and anxiety; and ‘not so much as to think of those, who, distressed on all ‘sides, can scarcely earn their bread by the sweat of their ‘brows.’ Bp. Horne. (Notes, Heb. xii. 4—13.)

V. 6—9. The haughtiness of these prosperous ungodly men appeared in their external decorations; nay, they counted that display of their pride, which is falsely called magnificence, their highest ornament; as conquerors, and other eminent persons, wore chains of gold round their necks for decoration and distinction. (Marg. Ref. k.) At the same time, their whole conduct was so notorious for violence and oppression, that they were covered with them as with a garment. Perhaps it is also implied, that their violence bore the expense of their ostentation, which they gratified in rich garments and costly ornaments. They likewise indulged and pampered their bodies, in the most luxurious manner; and their looks discovered their excessive sensuality and voluptuousness. Yet they reserved more from their enormous expenses, than a wise man would wish for; or more than they formerly could have thought of: such unexpected success attended them!—But, instead of being thankful for their abundance, their corrupt passions were thus exceedingly strengthened and inflamed: and, so far from restraining or concealing them, they openly gloried in them; avowing their designs and politick methods of oppressing the poor, and crushing opposition; despising the laws of man, and even those of almighty God; and haughtily uniting to their licentious, selfish, and unfeeling conversation, the language of infidelity or atheism; saying, not “within themselves,” but openly, “I neither fear God, nor regard man;” thus setting the Judge of the world at defiance, and propagating far and wide their pernicious and impious principles. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Sam. ii. 3. Job xxi. 7—16. xxii. 15—20. Luke xviii. 1—8.)—Alas! how many are there in modern times, who seem to have sat for the odious and detestable portrait here exhibited!—‘A circle of fawning

13 Verily, ^b I have cleansed my heart in vain, and ^c washed my hands in innocency.

^a are the men who prosper in the world, who succeed in every thing they undertake, and roll in riches! What are we to think of God, his providence, and his promises?... All my faith, my charity, and my devotion, all my watching and fastings,...all the labour and pains I have taken...have been altogether vain and fruitless.' Bp. Horne. (Notes, Job xxxiv. 5—9. xxxv. 1—3. Mal. iii. 13—18.)—The clause, "Washed my hands in innocency," seems equivalent to St. Paul's words, "Herein do I exercise myself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man." (Note, xxvi. 6—8. Acts xxiv. 10—21, v. 16.)

V. 15—17. The Psalmist, having related the progress of his temptation till it came to the crisis, next shews how by faith and grace he prevailed against it. In his greatest despondency, he could not but respect and wish well to "the generation of God's children;" and he considered, that if he gave utterance to such sentiments as had arisen within him, he should grieve, condemn, or deceive them, and so cause them to offend. He therefore purposed to acquire a full understanding of the mystery in Providence; and in the mean while to keep silence: but the more he reflected and reasoned on the subject, the deeper was his conviction that it was too difficult for him, and the greater perplexity he experienced; until he went at length into the sanctuary of God, to consult the priests, the Lord's ministers, and to examine his word, and spread the case before him in prayer; and then he was enabled to look forward to the last end, and to understand the final doom of prosperous sinners, so that he could no longer envy them, or complain of his own condition. (Notes, xxxvii. 35—38. xcii. 6, 7. Luke xvi. 19—23.)

21 Thus ^r my heart was grieved, and I was pricked ^s in my reins.

22 ^t So foolish was I, and ^u ignorant: I was ^v as a beast ^w before thee.

23 Nevertheless ^x I am continually with thee: ^y thou hast holden me by my right hand.

24 ^z Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward ^{aa} receive me to glory.

25 ^{ab} Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is ^{ac} none upon earth that I desire beside thee.

26 ^{ad} My flesh and my heart faileth: ^{ae} but God is the Strength of my heart, and ^{af} my Portion for ever.

27 For lo, ^{ag} they that are far from thee shall perish: thou hast destroyed all them ^{ah} that go a whoring from thee.

28 But ^{ai} it is good for me to draw near to God: I have put my trust in the Lord God, ^{aj} that I may declare all thy works.

V. 18—22. By the light of truth, and the eye of faith, the Psalmist clearly saw, that prosperous ungodly men stand on the slippery summit of a tremendous precipice; whence in the appointed time God casts them down by death, with a fall equal to the height to which they were elevated. In a moment they are desolated and ruined, and overwhelmed with terrors. (Notes, lviii. 6—9. Job xx. 4—9. Luke xii. 15—21.) The dread of death and judgment mars their enjoyment; and the death of any one of them terrifies the survivors. So that their happiness is but a transient, disturbed dream of pleasure: and God pours contempt upon this lifeless image of felicity; (Notes, xxxix. 6. Zech. xi. 15—17;) when arising to take vengeance, he by death awakes them to see substantial good for ever lost, and real misery unavoidable and eternal.—These considerations convinced the Psalmist of his sin and folly, in envying such wretched men. He was deeply ashamed, on recollecting the disquietude and impatience of his heart, and the effect produced even upon his animal frame, without any sufficient cause. And he appeared to himself, and knew that he must appear in the sight of God, to be ignorant and stupid as a beast, which has no conception of any other good than present sensual enjoyment. (Notes, Prov. xxx. 2, 3.)

V. 23—28. Emerging from his temptation, the Psalmist found his heart humbled, and his valuation of spiritual blessings greatly enhanced. He reflected, with pleasure and gratitude, on his privileges as a believer. He was persuaded that he was under the immediate care of an ever-present, wise, and faithful Friend, who had hitherto upheld him, especially under his urgent temptation; as a tender parent holds his child by the hand, lest he should fall and hurt himself. He was assured that the Lord would guide him in wisdom through life, and at death “receive him to glory:” nor could any thing in heaven or on earth, be worthy of being put in competition with his favour, or necessary to his happiness in accession to it. He relied on none of the real or supposed inhabitants of heaven; he expected not his future happiness from the society of the most exalted or excellent creatures; he did not delight even in his earthly friends and comforts, when compared with the Fountain of felicity, who was in every respect his All in all. He was aware that his body would speedily decay, his natural spirits fail, and his heart no longer beat; but God would strengthen and support his soul in that last conflict which would terminate all his sorrows, and then he would be his eternal Portion. (Notes, lxxxiv. 11, 12. John xiv. 2, 3. xvii. 24. Rom. ii. 7—11. v. 1, 2. 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18. iv. 13—18. 1 Pet. i. 8, 9. v. 1—4.) This would be his felicity, while the most prosperous of those who were alienated from God, and under his wrath, must perish; and Israelites especially, who broke their national covenant by apostasy, idolatry, and rebellion against God, would be more severely punished than others.—But for his part, he was satisfied that it was “good” (advantageous, pleasant, and honourable,) for him, to wait upon God, and walk with him, confiding in his mercy, and celebrating his praises, whatever should be his outward circumstances and situation. Thus the psalm concludes with the language of assured hope, and joyful anticipation of future and eternal glory in heaven: and as the sinners, above described, are supposed to prosper even to the end of life; the firm belief of a future state of punishment and perdition to ungodly men, is likewise as explicitly avowed, as almost in any part of the new testament. (Marg. Ref.) ‘He who, but a little while ago, seemed to question the providence of God over the affairs of men, now exults in happy confidence of the divine mercy;... nothing doubting, but that he would ever continue to guide him upon earth, till glory should crown him in heaven. Such are the blessed effects of “going into the “sanctuary,” and consulting “the lively oracles,” in all our doubts, difficulties, and temptations.’ Bp. Horne.—The doctrine established in this Psalm is highly useful, in understanding the arguments contained in the book of Job. (Notes, Job viii. 20—22. ix. 22—24. xlii. 7—9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The distinction has been obvious in every age, between mere professors of even the true religion, and those who are inwardly sanctified by the Holy Spirit: and it has always been an undisputed maxim in the church, that the Lord is kind to his people, whose hearts are upright with him. Yet appearances have often been against this truth; and Satan has had his advantage in exciting the impatience and unbelief even of pious persons, and causing them to disquiet themselves, and dishonour God, by their surmises:

9. Earnest pleas, that he would help his people, according to his former powerful works for Israel, and in remembrance of his covenant; and thus silence the blasphemies and reproaches of his enemies, 10—23.

so that many of them have had cause to say, “My feet were almost gone, my steps had well nigh slipped; for I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.” It is indeed, at first sight, a mystery in Providence, that the wicked so often prosper, and the righteous are so much afflicted. Health, long life, affluence, and an easy death, are often granted to the basest of men. Thus their pride, ambition, covetousness, and sensuality are increased; they grow more daring in impiety and iniquity; and, by their example and discourse, widely diffuse contagion and misery around them: while their impunity emboldens them to infidelity, and they say, “How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the “most High?” The mischief which these prosperous infidels and scorners occasion in the world is indeed very great: many professed Christians are by them drawn into apostasy; and even believers are often greatly discouraged; so that sometimes they are ready to think that their repentance, faith, love, zeal, watchfulness, and conscientiousness have been in vain. For being chastened from time to time, they are apt to call this “being plagued all “the day long.”—But though temptations may thus darken and perplex a true Christian, and very rebellious thoughts may be stirred up: yet there is a holy engrafted principle within, which will counteract them, prevent their effects, and at length gain the ascendancy; and when he has escaped the snare, he will be the better able to counsel and comfort his brethren. (Note, Luke xxii. 31—34.)

V. 15—28.

Sometimes, when “the fire burns within,” an unwillingness to grieve or stumble his fellow Christians, or to gratify the malice of the wicked, imposes silence on the tempted believer: for he must perceive, on reflection, that if outward prosperity were of prime importance, “the “generation of God’s children,” in every age, have acted most imprudently, or been greatly deluded, in enduring so many afflictions for the Lord’s sake. We shall, however, never get ground against temptations of this kind, by merely speculating; and shall rather find our minds perplexed with new difficulties and objections, till we bring the whole matter and weigh it in the balance of the sanctuary. But attention to the sacred Scriptures, and fervent prayer, will soon extricate us from these labyrinths: we shall then be led to look off from things seen and temporal, to things unseen and eternal: and when we consider the end of wicked men, we shall be convinced of their folly and misery; and clearly perceive that they are no more to be envied, than a state-criminal, who is bound in chains of gold till he be put to some tormenting death. We shall then see that their wealth and prosperity were given them in anger, as a punishment of their impiety and enmity against God; and that they were “treasuring up wrath,” until the time, when they were to be cast down headlong from their slippery pre-eminence into eternal destruction; of which in the mean-while they are often tortured with the apprehension. (Notes, Prov. x. 22. xxviii. 1.) Thus their happiness is only a dream; speedily they will awake, and the enchantment will be dissolved, and they will too late perceive their own misery. If we have ever envied such ruinous prosperity, or complained of the salutary corrections of our heavenly Father; and if our hearts have rebelled against his appointment; surely on reflection we must be ashamed of our folly and brutish stupidity, as well as of our perverseness and ingratitude! And indeed we do not gain a complete victory over the enemy, unless his buffetings prove the occasion of our deeper humiliation before God. (Note, 2 Cor. xii. 7—10.) Surely, that man has no right or reason to complain, or to envy, who has God for his Friend and Father, to provide for, comfort, and uphold him, to guide him here with his counsel, and then to receive him to eternal glory! Indeed heaven itself could not render us happy without his presence and love: much less could earth and all its possessions satisfy the desires of an immortal soul. And if the Lord is our Portion, we need desire no more besides him; for he is all-sufficient and everlasting. The world and all its glory vanishes; our “flesh and hearts will soon fail;” but God will be the Strength of our hearts, and our Happiness for ever. By sin we are all indeed far off from God, in the temper of our minds and the state of our souls; and at this distance misery is inevitable: but by the gospel we are invited to draw nigh to him; and as nothing, but preferring other portions and confidences to him and his salvation, can prevent our happiness, so the ruin of such as refuse this gracious offer is most certain; and a profession of Christianity, if men go on in sin, or return back to it, will increase their condemnation. May we then “choose that good part, which can never be taken from us.” May we prefer those enduring riches, those holy pleasures, and that genuine honour, which God bestows on his people. May we draw near and keep near to him by faith and prayer, and find it good to do so; that putting our trust in the Lord, and declaring our experience of his love, patiently bearing our cross, and despising worldly objects, we may encourage our brethren to resist, and teach them, by our counsel and example, to overcome these dangerous temptations of the enemy of our souls.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXIV. Title. This psalm is so adapted to the case of the Jews, during the Babylonish captivity, that if Asaph, who lived in the time of David, were the writer of it, he must have composed it by the Spirit of prophecy. But it is far more probable, that it was written by some other Asaph, who lived at the time of the captivity; or, as some think, by one of Asaph's descendants.

V. 1, 2. Israel as a nation was typically (what true Christians are really,) the sheep of God's pasture, his purchased congregation and ransomed inheritance, whom he redeemed by desolating Egypt; and among whom he dwelt, by the ark the symbol of his presence; which, from the days of David to the captivity, was stationed on mount Zion, and then was finally lost or destroyed. (Notes, xcv. 7. Ex. xv. 14—16. Is. xliii. 3, 4. Acts xx. 28.) Both the ten tribes and the kingdom of Judah had given abundant cause for the anger of God to smoke against them; and had even deserved to be “cast off for ever:” yet the pious remnant of the nation, remembering what the Lord had formerly done for their ancestors, and how he had repeatedly pardoned their rebellions, especially when they humbled themselves before him; knowing also that the promises and prophecies of the Messiah were not yet accomplished, and witnessing the insults of idolaters over the worshippers of the true God; were emboldened thus to plead, and as it were expostulate with him, for seeming finally to cast off his people, and to retain his anger for ever. (Notes, lxxix. 8—13. Is. lxiii. 7—19. lxiv. 5—12. Jer. xxxiii. 23—26.)—The church, and every true member of it, under persecution or oppression, though deserving worse than all that is inflicted, may on similar grounds plead for deliverance.

V. 3. The idolatrous Chaldeans had wickedly burnt the temple, and left it to perpetual desolations; and God himself seemed to stand at a distance, and pay no regard to it: but the Psalmist called on him to come speedily, that he might survey and restore his ruined Sanctuary. (Note, xlv. 23—26.)—Some render it, “Lift up thy feet, that thou mayest destroy every enemy, which hath done evil in thy Sanctuary.” (Notes, Is. xxv. 10—12. lxiii. 1—6. Rev. xiv. 14—20.)

V. 4. The Chaldeans, rushing into the temple, shouting for victory amidst the affrighted worshippers, and setting up their standards, or erecting trophies of their success, on that sacred ground, seem to be here described. (Notes, Lam. i. 8—11. ii. 6, 7.) Antiochus Epiphanes afterwards greatly profaned the temple, and dispersed the worshippers; but he did not burn it.—The prevalence of infidelity, and the triumphs of heathens, infidels, and anti-christian persecutors and corrupters of Christianity, are events equally lamentable; and the proper directory for prayer on such occasions is here given.

V. 7, 8. (Notes, 2 Kings xxv. 8—10. Is. lxiv. 9—12. Zech. xi. 1—3.) The word (סִנְגֻּרִים), rendered synagogues, is in the fourth verse translated congregations. It means, according to the context, either the stated seasons of assembling, the places in which the people met stately, or the congregations collected together at the solemn feasts, or the solemn feasts themselves. As it is doubtful whether synagogues, in the common sense of the word, had become general before the captivity; it is probable, that the courts of the temple, in which the people assembled, were intended; and that the passage might be rendered, “They have burned God’s places of assembling even to the “ground.” The LXX translate the clause, ‘Let us cause ‘the feasts of the LORD to cease from the earth.’ (Notes, 2 Kings iv. 23. 2 Chr. xvii. 7—9.)

V. 9. The constant sacrifices on the altar, and the observance of the solemn feasts, were signs of the Lord’s presence with his people, which ceased during the captivity: neither had they any miraculous interpositions in their favour. They had little encouragement from prophets, were destitute of prudent counsellors, and could not well determine when these calamities would cease.—Jeremiah indeed prophesied in Jerusalem before the destruction of the temple, and in Egypt after that event; and Ezekiel and Daniel in Babylon: yet they were often silent for a long while together, and the case of the pious Jews was very discouraging, and their prospect gloomy. Many of the predictions, likewise, of all these prophets, after the destruction of Jerusalem, related primarily to other nations and to distant periods. (Jer. xlvi.—li. Ez. xxv.—xxxii.) And though Daniel, and doubtless many others, understood from Jeremiah’s predictions, when to expect some favourable crisis; yet it is evident that even these eminent persons had considerable difficulty in knowing what that crisis would be, and when the nation would be restored to prosperity. (Notes, Dan. ix.) Consequently the pious remnant, dispersed in distant places, must in general have been greatly at a loss on these subjects; and have deeply regretted the want of prophets, bringing them explicit and encouraging messages from God, suited to their distressed condition.—The passage, however, is still more aptly descriptive of the state of the Jews, in their present long continued dispersion: and we may well suppose, that when numbers of that nation shall be led to enquire, on what account they have been left in captivity and oppression, for a term of years so vastly exceeding the duration of the Babylonish captivity, without priest, prophet, or token for good, or indication how long it will be before they are restored; this Psalm will direct or even express their complaints and devotions. (Notes, Gen. xlix. 10. Deut. iv. 25—28. Hos. iii. 4, 5.)—It may also suit the state of the Christian church, under the tyranny of antichrist, the entire termination of which cannot yet be precisely ascertained.

V. 10, 11. The reproaches and blasphemies, which insulting idolaters incessantly poured out against God and his worshippers, seem to have more grieved these supplicants, than their own distresses; and this was their principal plea in prayer. (Notes, xlv. 23—26. lxxxix. 8—13. lxxxix. 38—45. 50, 51. Is. li. 9—11.)

V. 12. ‘Why should we despair of it, since the great ‘God, whom they deride, has many ages ago undertaken ‘the government and protection of us,’ (the nation of Israel,) ‘working for us such deliverances in this land, ‘which now lies waste, as astonished all the world.’ Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref.—2 Kings xix. 2 Chr. xiv. 9—15. xx. 1—30.)

water, and then Jordan's flood was dried up to open their passage into Canaan. (Notes, Ex. xvii. 1—7. Josh. iii. iv.) These had been the tokens of JEHOVAH's care of them, and his power displayed in their behalf: and the appointment of the succession of night and day, and of summer and winter, through all the borders of the earth, by Israel's God, was a most encouraging demonstration of his omnipotence; and an emblem of the favourable change, which the afflicted Jews hoped he would effect in their circumstances. (Notes, Gen. i. 3—5. 14—19. viii. 20—22. Is. liv. 6—10.)—The words, rendered “the people inhabiting the wilderness,” may signify the wild beasts which live in deserts; and the clause may mean, that the bodies of Pharaoh and his captains, being thrown on shore, were devoured by beasts of prey.

V. 18. Notes, 21, 22. xiv. 1. lxxxix. 50, 51. Deut. xxxii. 26, 27.

V. 19. The word, rendered first “multitude” and then “congregation,” signifies living, or a living creature. It is often translated “beast,” or collectively “beasts:” but in many places it evidently means a living multitude. (Note, lxxviii. 30.) Some read this verse in connexion with the foregoing, “O deliver not the life of thy turtle into the hand of that multitude,” namely, the multitude of the foolish people who blasphemed God.—The church, as faithful and loving, pure and harmless, destitute and defenceless, and silently mourning under the displeasure and at the absence of her Beloved, is described under this beautiful image. Surely the Lord valued his turtle-dove too much, to leave her to be devoured by the hawks and eagles which surrounded her. (Marg. Ref.) ‘Yet hear our cries, and at last relieve a poor helpless company, who flee unto thee, and depend upon thee alone for safety.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 20. Though Israel was unworthy of God's regard, and had broken their national covenant; yet even that covenant gave intimation of returning favour to the nation, when brought to confess their sins and seek humbly to God, even from the ends of the earth; and of a reinstatement in Canaan, after their dispersions. (Notes, Lev. xxvi. 40—42. Deut. iv. 29—31. xxx. 1—10. 1 Kings viii.

46—53.) And the covenant with Abraham and his seed, and that with David and his seed, were in full force. (Marg. Ref. r.)—The coming of the promised Messiah from that race was thus unalterably secured: and how should the dark places of the earth, which were filled with the habitations of cruelty, be enlightened and converted, or the worship of God be at all maintained, if Israel were destroyed before the coming of that Redeemer, who was to be a “Light to the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel?”—“All places where thy word shineth not, there reigneth tyranny and ambition.” What a different view does this verse give us of those countries, where the oracles of God are not known, from that which some travellers and speculators draw of them! But the view here given is found on examination to accord with the real state of things all over the earth; and it should stimulate Christians to exert themselves in endeavouring to send the light of truth to the regions of darkness, and the habitations of cruelty, in all its varied and horrid forms.

V. 21, 22. ‘It is thy own cause, as well as our's: therefore, though thou waitest to be called on by us; yet thou wilt certainly and effectually plead it in due time: and in this hope we thus call on thee to arise for our deliverance, and the glory of thine own name.’ (Notes, ix. 18—20. xxi. 13. lxxxix. 8—13. cxv. 1, 2. Matt. vi. 13.)

V. 23. ‘While speaking, she seems to hear the tumultuous clamours of the approaching enemy growing every minute louder, as they advance; and we leave the turtle-dove, without the divine assistance, ready to sink under the talons of the rapacious eagle.’ Bp. Horne. (Notes, 1—4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Churches and nations, professing true religion, have often provoked God finally to cast them off; so that he would no longer acknowledge them as his flock or inheritance. But “the sheep” whom he has purchased, and brought into his pasture, and made to answer in character to this instructive emblem, and in whom he dwells by his Spirit, shall never be thus cast off. Yet the rod of his fatherly correction may sometimes be mistaken for the sword of his vengeance; the purification of his church, by the destruction or dispersion of degenerate professors, may make his people think that he intends to “make a full end” with them; and the methods used for the mortification of the evil propensities of believers, sometimes seem to threaten the destruction of their souls. (Notes, Rom. vii. 22—25.) But God will never utterly forsake any individual, who turns to him, by penitent faith, when he is corrected; nor any church, while there is a considerable remnant of such, as wrestle with him in fervent prayer to spare and deliver them: nor can the gates of hell prevail against his cause.—Infidels, persecutors, and hereticks, who do wickedly in God’s sanctuary, may make grievous desolations; they may erect their trophies, and glory in the mischief which they have devised; they may run down the truth, silence faithful ministers, shut up places of worship, and persecute Christians: and they may say in their hearts, ‘Let us destroy them and their religion together.’ In the mystery of Providence they may for a time prosper: and the oppressed servants of God may complain, that they see no tokens of deliverance, have none to encourage or counsel them, and cannot tell how long these calamities will last. But this remnant is the seed of a future harvest: they pray with fervent zeal for the glory of God, that he would not withdraw his hand, or delay his powerful interposition; but that he would “pluck his right hand out of his bosom,” to defend the cause of his people, and to vindicate his own insulted honour. Such prayers have hitherto prevailed: and the despised church has survived vast numbers of those assailants, who once triumphed over her, but are now perished as the dung of the earth. Indeed we cannot be too confident that the cause of God will prevail: we are allowed to expostulate with him freely, according to our feelings, when we are grieved to hear his name blasphemed, and his truth reviled; and every former mercy to his church constitutes a cogent argument, why he should again interpose to perfect what he has so gloriously begun.

V. 13—23.

The triumph of Christ over Satan, by his crucifixion and resurrection, and the consequent success of his gospel among the Gentiles, may be urged as a far greater display of his power and mercy, than any of the miracles wrought for the deliverance of Israel. If this God, who thus wrought salvation in the midst of the earth, be our King whom we willingly obey; he will make every assault of Satan, that great leviathan, and of all his progeny, to be profitable to our souls. If we drink of those waters, which flow from our smitten Rock, even the sanctifying influences of the Spirit of Christ; (Notes, Ex. xvii. 1—6;) he will also divide Jordan’s flood before us, that we may pass comfortably from this wilderness to the inheritance prepared for us.—The vicissitudes of day and night, summer and winter, (through the changing of our situation in respect of the sun, the fountain of light which God has prepared,) are emblematick of those changes in our circumstances and experiences, which must take place on earth; and should remind us neither to be secure, nor to despond. (Note, Jam. i. 16—18.) But in the world above, we shall have no more changes: “our Sun shall no more go down, and the days of our mourning will be ended.” While, in faith, and hope, and patience, we wait for this completion of our personal felicity; we may also confidently expect a glorious event of all the oppressions, persecutions, and corruptions, which have hitherto harassed the Christian church. We may indeed well enquire of the Lord, with astonishment, how long he will permit his adversaries to blaspheme his name. But it shall not be for ever: and the folly of such as reproach him and his servants, will at length be as visible to all men, as it now is to the remnant of despised believers. (Note, 2 Tim. iii. 6—9.)—The true church is as amiable and pleasant to the Lord as a turtle-dove, though poor and despicable in the world’s estimation. His covenant with the Redeemer engages for more extensive blessings than have yet been vouchsafed. Ere long the Jews shall be converted, the visible church purified, every antichrist destroyed, and the fulness of the Gentiles called. This time approaches: let us then call upon our God to “have respect unto his covenant;” to enlighten all the dark nations of the earth, which are filled with cruelty and wickedness; and to rescue his people from shame and dishonour, that the poor and needy may praise his name. Let us call upon him to arise and “plead his own cause,” and to silence, effectually and finally, the boastings and clamours of his enemies, which increase continually. This is our duty and privilege; and all the prayers, offered in this behalf, will at length terminate in loud acclamations of praise and thanksgiving.

PSALM LXXV. Title. (Marg. Ref.) If Asaph wrote this psalm, it is probable that he did it by the desire of David, upon his accession to the throne over all Israel: and the psalm seems well suited to that occasion.—Some, however, think that another Asaph wrote it, in the days of Hezekiah.

V. 1. Thy name is near.] JEHOVAH, exercising all the perfections of his glorious name, or character, was evidently nigh unto his people; as it appeared by his wondrous works for them, which excited their fervent gratitude. V. 3. The land of Israel was reduced to great distraction, towards the close of Saul's reign; every thing in church and state was unhinged; and the defeat at Gilboa, with the intestine divisions which followed, increased the confusion: but David had been anointed, by God's command, to uphold and establish the estate of Israel. Even before his accession, he had been the chief stay of his country: and when the whole nation willingly submitted to his government, he, by those magistrates whom he appointed, and supported in the exercise of their authority, soon brought their affairs to a happy settlement. V. 4. The words rendered "fools," and "deal not foolishly," seem properly to denote mad persons, and acting in an infatuated manner.—Saul of Tarsus was exceedingly "mad" against the church of Christ; but when he came to himself, and was endued abundantly with heavenly wisdom, men began to think him mad. V. 8. Heavenly blessings are, in scripture, represented by a cup full of wholesome, exhilarating wine: (Notes, cxvi. 13. Matt. xxvi. 26—29.) but the wrath of God is represented by a cup of wine, mingled with ingredients of that kind, which tend to produce fear, distress, and despondency; and, if drunk to excess, horror, infatuation, anguish, and despair. V. 9, 10. Before David came to the throne, he warned the wicked not to proceed in their evil courses: but he purposed, now that he had acquired authority, effectually to break the power of triumphant wickedness, and to encourage and prefer the righteous; as an apt representative of that righteous King, whom he typified. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The whole church, militant and triumphant, unites in thanksgivings to God for exalting the Redeemer to his mediatorial throne; and the discoveries made of the glorious perfections of God, in those wonderful works, by which this was effected, especially declares his presence with his people. Without him, the earth and all its inhabitants would rush impetuously into universal confusion, impiety, iniquity, and ruin: he alone "bears up the pillars of it;" and upholds and supports all those, whom he employs in supporting his cause in the world: (Note, 1 Tim. iii. 14, 15:) and all the present hopes and future happiness of any of the human race spring from the righteousness, atonement, intercession, and authority of the incarnate Son of God. Having received his congregation of redeemed sinners, and the kingdom over all for their sake, he judges uprightly: and by his ministers he warns such as proudly rebel, and exalt themselves against him, not to deal madly and foolishly, or to harden their hearts to their own destruction.—That God, who exalted the Redeemer to his throne, is the Fountain of honour, as well as the Judge of all: none can prosper who do not submit to him. He will account all to be his enemies, who will not have his beloved Son to be their Lord and Saviour; and such must for ever drink of the cup of his dreadful vengeance. But while all the horns of the wicked shall be cut off, and their ruin completed, his church shall inherit the throne of glory. Let sinners then submit to him: let believers rejoice in and obey him: and let Christian magistrates remember their obligations to imitate him, from whom they have their authority; that they may judge righteously, maintain, by the improvement of their talent, and by all scriptural means, the cause of piety; that they may crush the haughty oppressor, and protect, advance, and exalt the righteous. And let the people recollect, from whom their rulers have their authority; that they "may be subject 'not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake."

NOTES.

PSALM LXXVI. Title. Some copies of the Septuagint add to this title, “against the Assyrian.” The deliverance from Sennacherib indeed seems to have been celebrated in this Psalm.

V. 1. In Judah and Israel God was known and worshipped, and his name was honoured; but in no other part of the world, except as Jews or Israelites were dispersed through other nations. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlviii. 2, 3. cxlvii. 19, 20. Acts xvii. 22—31. 1 Cor. i. 20—24.)—Indeed to this day, all the genuine knowledge of the one living and true God, which is found on earth, may be traced back to writers and teachers of this despised nation. Where neither they nor their writings have come, God is still unknown; and if there be any religion, it is idolatry. This assertion admits of no exception or qualification. (Note, Zech. viii. 20—23. Rom. iii. 1, 2.)

V. 2. (Marg. Ref.) “Salem” here evidently means Jerusalem. (Note, Gen. xiv. 18—20.)

V. 3. The enemies of Judah had often marched to besiege Jerusalem, with every kind of warlike preparation: but, by the power of God, these formidable preparations became entirely useless, and they were unable to join battle with them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 5, 6. xlvii. 8, 9. 2 Chr. xiv. 9—15. xx. 22—25. xxxii. 17—22.)

V. 4. Zion, the chosen residence of JEHOVAH, was immensely more glorious and excellent than Babylon or Nineveh; and the kingdom of Judah, than those renowned monarchies, which contended with each other, to the destruction of the human species, as the beasts of prey on the mountains devour the feebler animals. (Note, Dan. vii. 2, 3.) The success of the ambitious warriors, in these destructive contests for power, were deemed their glory and excellency: but the church, beloved and protected by the Lord, and devoted to his service, had a glory and excellency of a nobler kind. (Notes, lxxxvii. 3—6. P. O.—Notes, Ez. xv. 1—6. P. O.)

V. 5, 6. These verses fix the date of this psalm, to the time of the destruction of Sennacherib’s army before Jerusalem. Then, his stout-hearted captains and soldiers were suddenly deprived of life: and, so far from being able to destroy Jerusalem, as they had boasted they would; they could make no more resistance to the power of the destroying angel, than if their hands had been cut off: for, at the rebuke of that God whom they had blasphemed, those who rode in chariots and on horses, as well as the common soldiers, were cast into a dead sleep. They went to sleep in the evening as in security; but they awoke no more in this world: and thus they were left to be plundered by those whom they came to plunder. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Kings xix. 35—37.)

V. 7. (Notes, 10—12. Jer. x. 6—10. Matt. x. 27, 28. Rev. vi. 15—17. xv. 1—4.)—“Neither the wisdom of the wise, nor the power of the mighty, no, not the world itself, can stand a single moment before him, “when “once he is angry.” Yet we continue to dread any frowns “but those of heaven: and one poor, vain, sinful man “shall, through a course of sixty or seventy years, incessantly and undauntedly tempt and provoke him, who “destroyed 185,000 in a night. What is this but madness?” Bp. Horne.

V. 8, 9. Hezekiah referred his cause to God by fervent prayer; who by the prophet Isaiah gave judgment from heaven against the blasphemous invaders: and then the angel carried the sentence into execution. (Notes, 2 Kings xix. 14—35. Is. x. 7—19. 24—34. xxix. 5, 6. xxx. 29—33. xxxiii.) Thus the Lord saved his humble and afflicted people throughout the land; the nations of the earth, being intimidated, silently desisted from their designs of destroying or enslaving them; and the land of Israel enjoyed profound peace.

V. 10. The rage and malice of the most mighty persecutors and tyrants, were always rendered subservient to the display of JEHOVAH’s glory, and to the good of his people. And if they, having undesignedly accomplished his purposes, proceeded to attempt any thing which was inconsistent with that object, he failed not to restrain or destroy them. This he had exemplified in the case of Sennacherib, who, being “ordained for correction,” (Note, Hab. i. 12—17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

God is more fully known, in the harmony of his attributes, under the Christian dispensation, than he was in Judah: and his glory is greater, as dwelling in human nature, than it was formerly, when he had his tabernacle on mount Zion, and was the Protector of Jerusalem. In vain do Satan and his servants wage implacable war, with tremendous preparations, against the church: the Lord has often confounded their devices, marred their weapons of war, and destroyed their armies. His peaceful, harmless, and holy people have frequently been shewn to be more formidable by their prayers, as well as more honourable and excellent, than the most successful scourges of mankind: and happy is that nation, which is well fortified with these bulwarks; for what is valour, strength, or numbers, against the Almighty? At his rebuke they tremble, stumble, and are not! He “alone is to be feared; for who “may stand in his sight when once he is angry?” Yet puny mortals dare madly, through their whole lives, to defy the vengeance of that God, one of whose innumerable company of angels in one night destroyed a hundred and eighty-five thousand men! But if temporal judgments excite such consternation, what will be the case when the Lord shall arise to judgment at the last day! Happy they, who are now meek and “poor in spirit;” who trust in his mercy and submit to his will, who vow allegiance to him, and dedicate their all to his service! Man may despise or be enraged at them, and the powers of darkness may excite storms around them; but all shall turn to the glory of God in their salvation: and when their enemies attempt any thing, which would do them real harm, God will restrain this remainder of their wrath. (Notes, Rom. viii. 28 —39.) Let us then seek his favour as our portion; and commit all our concerns to his wise, powerful, and gracious care, who can dispirit or destroy the most courageous and mighty, and is terrible to the ungodly kings of the earth.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXVII. Title. ‘A psalm composed by ‘Asaph, and sent by him to that Song-master, who was ‘over the children of Jeduthun.’ Bp. Patrick.—It is however uncertain, when the psalm was written, and whether it refers to the personal trials of the Psalmist, or to public calamities, or to both combined.—Some conjecture that it was composed, as expressive of Hezekiah’s feelings, during his sickness; and others that it was written during the captivity: but, as no reference is made to any of God’s dealings with Israel, subsequent to their deliverance out of Egypt, it seems more likely that it was written as early as the time of David, and by that Asaph who was his contemporary. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 1. The abruptness of the original is very expressive of the agitation of mind, which the Psalmist had experienced. “My voice unto God, and I cried; my voice “unto God, and he gave ear unto me.”—Till his prayer received a gracious answer, this agitation of mind continued, and he proceeds to describe it, and to shew how he struggled against impatience and unbelief. (Notes, xl.
1—5. cxvi. 1—4.)

V. 2. My sore.] According to this translation, the Psalmist represents his affliction, whatever it was, as a wound which bled or ran incessantly, wasting his strength during the night, while others were recruiting their’s by sleep. (Notes, 4. vi. 6, 7. xxxii. 3—5. xxxviii. 1—10. Job vii. 1—6. 13, 14. Is. xxxviii. 9—13.) But the original word is my hand; and it is probable the following is a just paraphrase of the passage: “In the day of my trouble,” ‘I have restlessly implored help from the Lord. In the ‘night, when men are wont to bury their troubles in sleep,
‘I have with unwearied diligence spread out my hands ‘unto him; ... resolving to admit of no consolation, till I ‘obtained a gracious answer.’ Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. "I remembered God, and was greatly disturbed "in mind: I meditated, and my spirit was overwhelmed."—"He sheweth that we must patiently abide, although God 'deliver us not out of our troubles at the first cry.'—The Psalmist describes his inward perturbation, by a word expressive of the tumult of the waves in a storm, or that of an enraged, disorderly multitude. It is probable, that conscious guilt gave Satan the occasion of exciting in him dismay and distress, when he reflected on the divine perfections; and that impatience and despondency thus combined, in rendering his soul like the troubled sea: insomuch that the thoughts of the Lord's mercy and truth, his former kindnesses, and the comfort which he had experienced in religion on other occasions, instead of giving him encouragement, served to enhance his disquietude, now that God hid his face from him, and seemed to become his enemy. (Notes, Job vi. 1—4. xix. 5—22. xxiii. 13—17. Jer. xvii. 15—18. Matt. xxvi. 36—39.)

V. 4. Our Lord was kept watching during that dreadful night, in which, being "sore amazed and very heavy," he said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death:" this was just before he stood silent in the presence of Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate: and the language in this part of the psalm is so emphatical, that the attentive reader can hardly fail to recollect that of Christ during the depth of his humiliation.

V. 5—12. In these verses the Psalmist describes his inward struggle against unbelief and despair. In the depth of his distress, he applied his mind to meditate on ancient times, when God had wonderfully interposed in behalf of his people, and shewn himself most ready to pardon their sins, compassionate their sorrows, and to hear their prayers. He also determined to recollect his own experience of such mercies and deliverances, as had led him to spend a part of the night in singing praises to God: (Notes, xlii. 6—8. Acts xvi. 25—28. Jam. v. 13:) and likewise to call himself to strict account, and diligently to examine and enquire, 'both the causes, why he was chastened, and when his sorrows should have an end.' He was, however, strongly tempted to conclude, that God had cast him off for ever, and would shew him no more favour. 'But,' says he, 'Can this be? Can he who was known to delight in mercy cease to be merciful? Will he break his own promise? Is he so angry, as no more to pardon the penitent and pity the miserable? This cannot be. I will reject with abhorrence the dishonourable thought. It is the disease and weakness of my soul, that I ever harboured it. Whatever appearances may be, God continues merciful and faithful, ready to forgive, and plenteous in goodness and compassion. "The years of the right hand of the "Most High," the times when he lifted up his right hand to deliver his people, prove this; I will therefore fix my attention on those ancient works of JEHOVAH, and thus endeavour to encourage my desponding heart, and to calm my conflicting passions.' (Notes, xlii. 4, 5. lxxiii. 1. 15—22. 1 Sam. xxx. 6.)—Most expositors seem to think, that the Psalmist's alarm and distress were occasioned by public calamities, in great measure at least. But there is no intimation of this; and personal trials and temptations might be so great and complicated, as to excite the sharp conflict which he so affectingly describes: and indeed these are, in general, more apt to produce the state of mind and experience here described. (Marg. Ref.) 'This consideration makes the eucharistic psalms ever pleasing and ever comfortable to the mind: they are appeals to those attributes, which have been so often displayed, in the cause of the church; they are acts of faith, looking backward to the past, and forward to the future; they are praises, and they are prayers.' Bp. Horne.

V. 13. The Psalmist's faith and grace now obtained the ascendancy over his rebellious will, his unbelief, and his temptations; and he was satisfied, that the "way of God," (or the exercise of his sovereign authority, over the world, the church, and every individual,) is under the direction of infinite wisdom, and ordered in perfect justice, truth, and goodness. (Note, xxv. 10.) It is "in holiness," (שְׁפָאֵר;) and so consists with his testimonies, his promises, and his covenant. It is "in the sanctuary;" and being beyond the reach of man's wisdom cannot be understood, except by those who enter into the sanctuary, and weigh all things in the balances of the sanctuary. For his unrivalled, his infinite greatness, seems to cloud the glory of his justice and goodness, to the sinful children of Adam. (Notes, 19, 20. xxxvi. 5—9. xcii. 4—7. xcvi. 2. Rom. xi. 33—36.)

V. 14, 15. 'Thou art the mighty God, who canst do miracles, as easily as the most ordinary works: ... having delivered thy people descended from Jacob, and miraculously preserved by Joseph, from the Egyptian bondage, by a long series of stupendous judgments upon Pharaoh and his servants.' Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref.)—The people. (14) ^o Peoples, plural; the surrounding nations.

^g Ex. xiii. 14. xv. wonders : ⁵ thou hast declared thy strength among the people.

^h cxlvi. 11, 12. 15 Thou hast ^h with thine arm re- deemed thy people, ⁱ the sons of Jacob and Joseph. Selah.

V. 16—18. The waters, even to the bottom of the Red sea, are here most poetically described as affrighted, and as rendered sensible of the presence of God their Creator with Israel, and as obedient to his will; nay, all nature is represented, as put into consternation and violent commotion before him. (Note, cxiv. 3—8.) It is probable, that the destruction of the Egyptians was attended by most tremendous and destructive tempests, thunders, lightnings, and earthquakes. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. xiv. xv. 1—19.)

V. 19, 20. All the dispensations of God towards his people are in mercy; but, like Israel's passage through the Red sea, they are often attended with circumstances of dismay. His ways of dealing with them can no more be traced, than the path of Israel, when he led them, as a flock, through the Red sea; (Notes, Is. lxiii. 11—14;) and they are called to trust in him, while he conducts them by a way, with which they are wholly unacquainted, and which is displeasing and discouraging to the flesh. (Marg. Ref.)—By these meditations the Psalmist at length found his heart encouraged; and therefore he left them upon record for the benefit of posterity. (Notes, lxxiii. 18—28.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In this world our praises are often interrupted by complaints. Sin, temptation, affliction, the calamities of the church, and the miseries of the world, must cause us to "groan, being burdened." (Note, Rom. viii. 18—23.) When the heart is greatly pained, nature expresses that pain by the voice; but grace will teach us to send our cries to heaven with earnest importunity for relief. Yet sometimes even those, who are instant in prayer, may be tempted to despond, and to overlook the sources of comfort which are pointed out to them; and a deep sense of their own unworthiness may afford Satan an opportunity of suggesting such gloomy apprehensions, that even thoughts of God may increase their disquietude and horror. Thus the eyes may be holden from sleep, and the mouth may be closed, while sorrows too big for utterance distend and distract the heart. But this will not last very long with the upright believer: the troubled fountain will work itself clear again; and even the recollection of former times of more joyful experience, though it cause his wounds to bleed afresh, will often suggest a hint, or inspire a hope, tending to his relief. It is, however, always good to "commune with our own hearts;" and to "make diligent search," concerning the cause, the intention, and the remedy of our distresses; especially, that we may ascertain, whether, notwithstanding our unworthiness, we be indeed truly humbled believers. And if the enemy would lead us to suspect, that the "Lord will cast off his people for ever," and be no more favourable to them, we should reject the injurious suggestion with horror and indignation. What! will God no more favour those who have walked with him, and are now mourning after him? Has his everlasting mercy come to an end? Is his faithful promise failed? Has God forgotten to be gracious, and in anger shut up his tender mercy? And will he dishonour himself, by leaving the humble, penitent, praying soul to perish? (Note, xiii. 5, 6.) It is our infirmity, for which we should rebuke ourselves, if we have for a moment entertained such thoughts: and we should without delay turn our minds to more encouraging meditation. The years of ancient times, and the Lord's wonders for his people of old, form proper subjects for our contemplation and discourse on such occasions; as they are illustrious evidences of his power, mercy, and love to his church. But the mysteries of redeeming love, and the great events which attended the Saviour's sufferings, and exaltation to his glorious throne, should be our favourite theme. There all the divine perfections are displayed: and the sinner, who understands and believes the sure testimony of Scripture on this subject, will be encouraged to expect every thing from the power, truth, and love of that God, who "spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, that with him, he might freely give us all things." (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—34.) It is true, that the Lord's way is "in the sea," but it is also "in the sanctuary:" he leads his people through deep waters of affliction or temptation; but he goes with them, and brings them forth, when he has thus destroyed their enemies. We cannot trace his footsteps, nor understand the reasons of his dispensations: but we are called to believe that he will guide us by his counsel; and that those things, which we are tempted to ascribe to his having "forgotten to be gracious," are the result of his unsearchable wisdom choosing for us, in order to our good, what we should never have chosen for ourselves. If he see proper, he can soon raise up such instruments as Moses and Aaron, to lead his people, like a flock, through intervening seas and deserts, to their inheritance: and if the under shepherds neglect their charge, he will feed and guide them himself. "Happy then are

NOTES.

PSALM LXXVIII. Title. It is probable that Asaph wrote this psalm some time after the death of David. As nothing is referred to, later than David's advancement to the throne, and his subsequent conduct, there is no ground for supposing that it was written at a much later period.

V. 1. The word rendered law, in this connexion, evidently means the doctrine, or instruction, which the Psalmist was divinely inspired to set before the people: to which, in the name of the Lord, he demanded their reverent attention. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xix. 7—11. cxix. 1.)

V. 2. The Evangelist says that this was fulfilled, when Christ spake to the people in parables. (Notes, Ps. xlix. 1—4. Matt. xiii. 34, 35.) Yet the psalm contains nothing but a plain narrative of facts, without any thing of parable or riddle in it; except as the history of Israel, like the parables of Christ, was a picture, or similitude, of heavenly things; and these records would remain, in this respect, dark sayings to those who understood not the typical meaning of them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Cor. x. 1—10.)

V. 3—8. The Israelites were frequently and earnestly instructed, to render their children, by every means, familiarly acquainted with the works and commandments of God: and as the Psalmist, and his contemporaries, had derived the benefit of this most useful information from their ancestors, he was determined, and aimed to induce others also, to deliver down the same to the rising race, and through them to the next generation, and thus successively to the end of time. For this was the proper method of bringing them to trust in God and obey him; to imitate the faith and holiness of their pious ancestors; and to take warning not to copy the rebellion, unbelief, and ungodliness of such as had brought the judgments of God upon them by their sins. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lxxi. 17, 18. cxlv. 4—7. Ex. xiii. 11—16, v. 14. Deut. vi. 6—9.) The word testimony is used for the ark, and for the law written on tables of stone put within the ark, and covered with the mercy-seat. This testified the Lord's gracious presence with his people, and seemed to point out to them both the way of access and acceptance, and the standard or rule of their duty. (Note, Ex. xxv. 10—21.)

V. 9—11. Nothing is recorded in the history of Israel, concerning the cowardice of the Ephraimites, as distinct from that of the other tribes: some therefore think, that “the children of Ephraim” is put by a figure of speech, for the nation in general. Others suppose, that this tribe greatly influenced their brethren, when they refused to go up and possess the land, at the express command of God, who promised to fight for them: and then, after the sentence of exclusion was irrevocably passed, they armed themselves, and presumptuously would go up, contrary to the warning of God by Moses; but when the Amorites came out against them, they fled, and were chased like bees to Hormah. (Notes, Num. xiv.) But the passage may relate to the defeat of Israel by the Philistines, when the ark of God was taken.—Shiloh was situated in the lot 12 ¶ ^y Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers, in the land of Egypt, in the field of ^z Zoan.

13 ^a He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through; and ^b he made the waters to stand as an heap.

14 ^c In the day-time also he led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire.

15 He ^d clave the rocks in the wilderness, and gave them drink as out of the great depths.

16 He ^e brought streams also out of the rock, and caused waters to run down like rivers.

17 ¶ And ^f they sinned yet more against him by provoking the most High in the wilderness.

18 And they tempted God in their heart, ^g by asking meat for their lust.

19 Yea, ^h they spake against God: they said, ⁱ Can God ^j furnish a table in the wilderness?

20 Behold, ^k he smote the rock, that the waters gushed out, and the streams overflowed; ^l can he give bread also? can he provide flesh for his people?

21 Therefore ^m the LORD heard this, and was wroth: so ⁿ a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel;

22 ^o Because they believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation:

23 Though ^p he had commanded the clouds from above, and ^q opened the doors of heaven, 24 And ^r had rained down manna upon them to eat, and had given them of the corn of heaven.

25 ^t Man did eat angels' food: ^u he sent them meat to the full.

26 ^v He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven: and by his power he brought in the south wind.

27 ^w He rained flesh also upon them as dust, and ^x feathered fowls like as the sand of the sea.

28 And he let it fall in the midst of their camp, round about their habitations.

29 So they did eat, and were well filled: ^y for he gave them their own desire;

30 They were not estranged from their lust: ^z but while their meat was yet in their mouths,

31 The wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them, and ^a smote down the ^b chosen men of Israel.

of Ephraim: and perhaps the men of that tribe led on the battle; but, giving way, their misconduct brought on a general defeat. (Notes, 1 Sam. iv.) In either case, the cowardice of the people was the effect of their unbelief and disobedience. They answered not the expectations formed of them; “they kept not the covenant of God, and refused to walk in his law; and forgot his works and his wonders that he shewed them.”—These verses however may be understood of Israel, who, in their general conduct, imitated that of Ephraim, in some notorious instances of cowardice and ill behaviour.

V. 12. The reader must once for all be referred to the notes upon the parts of the preceding history, pointed out in the margin, in which all the events here recapitulated have been fully considered. This poetical abstract would greatly assist the people, in becoming acquainted with their most instructive history, and preserving a ready remembrance of it. Zoan was a principal city of Egypt, in which perhaps Pharaoh kept his court. (Marg. Ref.—43—49.)

V. 13—16. These verses are read in some versions in the pluperfect tense: “He had divided, &c.” He had wrought these miracles for Israel, before those rebellions which the Psalmist was enumerating; and this rendered their unbelief and disobedience the more inexcusable.—Two rocks were smitten in the wilderness. (Notes, Ex. xvii. 1—7. Num. xx. 8—13.)—“Let us,” says Bishop Taylor, “by the aids of memory and fancy, consider the children of Israel in the wilderness, “in a barren and dry land where no water was,” marching in dust and fire, not wet with the dew of heaven, but wholly without moisture, save only what dropt from their own brows: ... suppose, I say, these thirsty souls hearing Moses promise that he will smite the rock, and that a river should break forth from thence; observe how presently they run to the foot of the springing stone thrusting forth their heads and tongues to meet the water, impatient of delay, crying out that the water did not move, like light, all at once: and then suppose the pleasure of their drink, the insatiableness of their desire: ... they took in as much as they could, and they desired much more. This was their sacrament, and this was their manner of receiving it. And if that water was a type of our sacrament, or a sacrament of the same secret blessing, then is their thirst a signification of our duty.”

V. 17—31. Some time after the manna and the water from the rock had been vouchsafed, the people began again to murmur and rebel against God, and some of them were consumed by lightning; “and yet for all this his anger was not turned away,” because they murmured still more. The table, which they insolently required, was not the manna; for that had been sent with a multitude of quails also, before the water from the rock. (Notes, Ex. xvi.) But they loathed and despised manna as light bread; and wanted such provisions, as the inhabitants of cultivated countries live upon, which they thought God was not able to provide in the desert. Perhaps they endeavoured to persuade themselves, that the manna, and the water from the rock, were supplied from natural resources; and only directed or regulated in a supernatural manner by JEHOVAH's power: but they supposed it to be impossible even for Omnipotence to furnish bread and flesh to so vast a multitude. This conclusion, after all the works of God which they had witnessed, and his special favours and express promises to them, was exceedingly provoking: he therefore determined to vindicate the honour of his own name, by shewing that he was able to feed, as well as feed them, in the wilderness: and then amidst their excessive indulgence, to punish their unbelief and rebellion, by cutting off the most powerful, healthy, and luxurious among them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Num. xi. 1—23. 31—34.)—Manna, descending from the clouds, is here called “the corn of heaven,” and “angels’ food,” or “the bread of the mighty;” perhaps, because it rendered the people healthy, and vigorous for their marches and wars. But it typified “that Bread which came down from heaven, and giveth life to the world;” by which man is brought to feed on angels’ food, and to participate their felicity. (Notes, John vi. 30—35. 41—58.) “The blessings chosen for us by God are blessings indeed, and, like the manna, bring no sorrow with them; but when we chuse for ourselves, and are so unhappy as to be gratified in that choice, our portion too often proves a curse; and while the much loved morsel is yet between our teeth, “the wrath of God comes upon us,” for making a wrong choice. This will always be the case, ... whenever earth is preferred to heaven, and sense to faith.” Bp. Horne.

V. 32, 33. Here, that instance of unbelief and rebellion, which provoked God to exclude the whole generation from the promised land, is peculiarly adverted to: for that sin, they were condemned to die in the wilderness, without ever enjoying or witnessing the comforts of a cultivated country, and a settled abode.—Their lives, even more than those of other men, were indeed spent in vanity; and as scarcely any of that vast multitude had arrived at the age of sixty, when their wanderings were ended, (“for the hand of the LORD was against them to consume them,”) it might well be said, “their years were “consumed in trouble” or perturbation of mind. (Marg. Ref.—Notes and P. O. Num. xiv.)—“Though they travelled up and down, very much and long, yet it was to no purpose; for they were never the nearer to their journey’s end; nor were ever free from one plague or other, till they” (that generation) “were utterly destroyed.” Bp. Patrick.

V. 34. “Who, that hath been conversant in the house of mourning, and about the bed of sickness, but must have seen frequent instances of a temporary and deceitful repentance?” Bp. Horne. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. xxii. 20—23. Hos. v. 15. Luke xvii. 11—19.)

V. 35. Redeemer.] That is, from Egyptian bondage; for the bulk of the people did not understand the spiritual redemption, which was typified by that transaction. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 36, 37. “Such was their hypocrisy, that they sought unto God for fear of punishment, though in their heart they loved him not.”—“Whatsoever cometh not from the pure fountain of the heart, is hypocrisy.” (Marg. Ref.)—Right. (37) נָבִיז, constant. (Note, li. 10.)

V. 38. “Had God stirred up all his wrath, the Israelites must have been exterminated in the wilderness. But then the promises made to Abraham and to all mankind had failed.—Therefore they were forgiven and not destroyed; judgment was executed from time to time upon ... offenders; but the nation subsisted, until the Seed came, to whom the promise was made. Nay, ... the race is yet marvellously preserved, and, we trust, preserved for mercy, to be shewn them in the last days.” Bp. Horne. (Notes, Num. xiv. 13—19. 27—30.)

V. 39. (Marg. Ref.) The frailty of man, as incapable of enduring the wrath of God, is here emphatically described; as well as the divine compassion for such feeble worms: but it is not to be supposed, nor can the language be fairly interpreted to mean, that God considers man’s sinful nature as a palliation of his actual rebellions; yet the passage is sometimes thus explained. (Notes, Gen. vi. 3. Matt. xxvi. 40, 41.)

V. 41. Limited.] The Israelites did not believe, that God could and would destroy the Anakims before them, and give them the land of Canaan: but in this and many

V. 42—45. Notes, Ex. vii—ix.—Devoured. (45) This word shews, that, besides the loathsomeness of flies, and their maggots; a variety of venomous insects, reptiles, or animals, were sent among the Egyptians, to bite, and sting, and harass them; and that in many instances their bite or sting was mortal. Indeed the word rendered “divers sorts of flies,” is so general, that even devouring wild beasts may be meant by it, as well as insects and reptiles. (Note, Ex. viii. 21.)

V. 46—49. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. ix, x.) Perhaps evil angels terrified the Egyptians, during the plague of darkness: they were, however, permitted to deceive and harden them to their destruction. They were ‘horribly astonished, and troubled with strange apparitions. For neither might the corner that held them keep them from fear: but noises as of waters falling down sounded about them; and sad visions appeared unto them with heavy countenances. No power of the fire might give them light; neither could the bright flames of the stars endure to enlighten that horrible night. ... Though no terrible thing did fear them; yet being scared with beasts that passed by, and hissing of serpents, they died for fear.’ Wisdom of Solomon, xvii. 3—5. 9, 10. Such were the traditions of the Jews on this subject, when this apocryphal book was written.

V. 50, 51. The preceding miracles and judgments, during which the long suffering of God had given the Egyptians space for repentance, had only proved an occasion to them of filling up the measure of their sins; and this made a way (or, weighed a path, marg.) for the execution of his righteous vengeance in a still more awful manner, by the sudden destruction of all the first-born in the land, as by a pestilence. V. 56—60. The history of Israel, from the death of Moses to that of Eli, as contained in the books of Joshua and Judges, and the first four chapters of the first of Samuel, forms the best comment on these verses. V. 61. His strength.] That is, The ark, the symbol of JEHOVAH's protecting presence with his people, and which, as typifying the harmonious display of his perfections in the salvation of Christ, is also called "his glory," or his beauty. (Notes, Ex. xxv. 10—21. 2 Chr. vi. 41, 42.)

V. 63. The wrath of God gave up the army of Israel into the hands of the Philistines, to be consumed as by fire. Thus their young men perished, their enemies triumphed, and their virgins were not praised, (marg.) according to the custom of commending them in songs, when they were married. Either they remained single; or in a time of public calamity, amidst the insulting oppressions of their enemies, all the customary tokens of joy were omitted. (Notes, 1 Sam. iv.)

V. 65, 66. While the Philistines were inflicting deserved punishment on the Israelites, the Lord seemed like one asleep, and as not regarding either his people, or even "the Ark of his strength." But when their resentment or their ambition had accomplished his purposes, he suddenly and effectually interposed to rebuke the impious triumphs of the idolaters, and to put them and their idol to a perpetual shame: (Note, lxxvi. 10 :) even as a mighty man of valour would rest, or refresh himself, notwithstanding the advance of the enemy, till the moment arrived for executing his own plan; and then he would burst forth on them with unexpected and irresistible fury. (Notes, Is. xlii. 13—17. li. 9—11.) By the emerods, the Lord disgraced as well as discomfited the Philistines, and constrained them to send back the ark: and by the golden images of the emerods and of the mice that marred the land, they were led to publish and perpetuate their own disgrace. (Notes, 1 Sam. v. vi. 1—18.)

V. 67—69. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, cxxxii. 6—17. Gen. xlix. 8—10. John iv. 19—24.) These verses shew that the Psalm was written after the building of the temple, and consequently not sooner than eleven or twelve years after the death of David. For the language cannot suit the tabernacle which he placed on mount Zion; as that was soon to be superseded by a magnificent temple, which was at length erected so strong, that it appeared likely to stand as long as the earth endured. It was, however, destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar: and though Zion continued the centre of JEHOVAH's worship, till the coming of Christ; yet it has now been trodden under foot of the Gentiles for above seventeen hundred years. (Note, Luke xxi. 20—24.)

V. 70—72. (Notes, lxxxix. 19—37. 1 Sam. xv. 26—28. xvi. 1—13. xvii. 2 Sam. v. 1, 2. vii. 8—11. Is. xl. 9—11. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31.) What an emphatical attestation to the excellence of David's general conduct, as king of Israel, does this passage contain! (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. 1 Chr. xxix. 10—19. 26—28. 2 Chr. xxxi. 20, 21.) In this especially he was a type of our Saviour, and a pattern both to rulers, and to Christian ministers. 'The qualifications, requisite for the due discharge of high offices, are best learned, at first, in an inferior station; especially if it be one that will inure them to labour and vigilance.' Bp. Horne.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The instructions of the sacred word are dark sayings to the inattentive and self-confident: and yet they are very plain to the humble, diligent, and obedient enquirer, who earnestly prays for the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and reduces to practice, and realizes in his experience, what he learns from thence. (Notes, Prov. i. 1—6. ii. 1—6. xiv. 6.) The truths, precepts, and works of God, which have been recorded and transmitted to us by our progenitors, form a sacred deposit, which we must hand down to pos-

"them to their children; that they might set their hope
"in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his "commandments." (Note, Rom. iii. 1, 2.) To perform this important duty to good purpose, we must enforce our instructions by a consistent example: and it is awful to think how many parents, by their negligence and wickedness, become the murderers of the souls of their children.
But should any young persons read these observations, who cannot but know that their parents are stubborn and rebellious: let them remember, that, though they must not expose their faults, or neglect to submit to them in all things lawful; yet they must neither obey their sinful orders, nor copy their examples. On the contrary, they are bound to requite their kindness in things temporal, by earnestly praying for their conversion: and by recommending the profession of the gospel to them, with the most respectful, obliging, and affectionate behaviour; and by such modest hints, as may consist with the honour due to that superior relation.—The lax principles, the disobedience, and the apostasy of many professed Christians shew, that they never set their hearts aright, and that their spirit was never stedfast with God: they were never duly humbled and set against sin; they never were weaned from the world, or prepared for the cross and the conflict; they never cordially received the Lord for their Portion and Salvation, counting all but loss in comparison of him. In time of temptation, therefore, like the cowardly Ephraimites, though armed as soldiers, they basely turn their backs on the enemy; "they renounce the covenant of God, and "refuse to walk in his law."

V. 12—54.

We cannot avoid repeating, that in Israel's history we have a picture of our own hearts and lives, and a compendium of the history of the world, and of the church. (P. O.
Neh. ix.) The common benefits afforded by the Creator to the whole human race, when viewed in connexion with our conduct towards him, evidently leave us without excuse. His sun rises to give us light, his rain descends to make the earth fruitful, and the seasons in succession pour forth an exuberance for our use and indulgence: yet these blessings are generally received with unthankfulness, and abused in intemperance; few are content with meat for their use, but almost all crave provision for their lusts, and are unwilling to trust the power and goodness of God for the future. Insensible of the protecting hand of him, "in "whom they live, and move, and are," most men spend their lives in rebellion: and when he is provoked to bring them into troubles and dangers, there are but few who seem to return to him and enquire after him; and the event proves, that most of these few only "flatter him
"with their mouth, and lie unto him with their tongues."
So that the patience of God, and the warnings and mercies which he sends, "to lead men to repentance," embolden them to harden their hearts, and treasure up wrath, until the measure of their iniquities is full; and then he casts upon them the fierceness of his wrath, and gives them up to be hardened and destroyed.

The history of nations is in many respects the same.
God has not indeed dealt with any nation, in every respect, as he did with Israel: but increasing affluence and prosperity have almost uniformly produced proportionable pride, luxury, licentiousness, and impiety: and judgments and mercies have generally been neglected, or very superficially attended to, until the measure of national guilt was filled; and then some other people were employed to execute the vengeance of God upon them. This has appeared with peculiar evidence, in nations favoured with the word of God and professing his truth. The outward means of grace have been to them, like the pillar of cloud and fire, and the Bread and Water of life; and manifold providential favours have been vouchsafed. But where is that nation professing Christianity, which has not copied Israel's example? Certainly Britain is no exception to this rule.
On us the manna has been rained all around our habitations; and wells of salvation have been opened, and the waters of life have flowed, in almost every corner of our land. We have been equally favoured by an indulgent Providence, and have experienced many former and later extraordinary deliverances: but neither judgments nor mercies have prevented the rapid increase of infidelity, profligacy, impiety, and oppression. And if, under any pressing calamities, we have seemed sensible of our obligations and dependence; and have returned, and enquired after God "our Rock and our Redeemer;" the event has detected our base hypocrisy. Hitherto, the Lord, being full of compassion, has spared us: but if we still forget his mercies, and neglect and abuse his gospel, what can we expect, but that he will cast us off, and number us with the hardened Egyptians; that he will make a way for his anger, and glorify himself by inflicting judgments on us, as singular as our mercies have been?

Even in those collective bodies, which have made a stricter profession of his truth, the case has been similar.
Distinguished advantages have not prevented churches, one after another, from degenerating into formality or heresy, from forsaking the covenant of God, and casting off his commandments. The profession and knowledge of the truth have in many instances only increased pride and presumption; men have administered the sacred ordinances as mere external forms; and they have rested upon the baptism of water, and the sacramental bread and wine, without the inward and spiritual grace signified by them.
(Notes, 1 Cor. x. 1—12.) Many religious societies have split into parties, and turned aside unto vain jangling;
many have evidently returned back into the world; and others have declined to superstition and will-worship, and provoked God to jealousy with their high places and graven images: and neither warnings, mercies, nor judgments have stopped their course, till their candlesticks have been removed, and their privileges given to others. Nor has any collective body yet been found, which has been durably preserved from such declensions. Let those “who think they stand, take heed lest they fall.”

Even true believers are not unconcerned. Many of them can recollect, that for years they perverted the kindness of Providence into an occasion of sin. The Lord's patience emboldened them in their evil courses; his bounty increased their self-indulgence; and even the warnings of his word, and their convictions of conscience, served only to discover their obstinacy in rebellion. Perhaps a near prospect of death sometimes frightened them to their devotions, but upon recovery they relapsed into ungodliness. They must therefore now admire the Lord's compassion and forbearance, in that he did not stir up all his wrath against them and destroy them. At length he came with an outstretched arm for their deliverance: and he found them slaves of Satan and in love with their bondage, nor could they be persuaded to accede to his invitations; nay, they hated and resisted his truths and convictions, until his new-creating grace had powerfully made them willing. Then he broke off their chains, and rescued them from their oppressor; he forgave their sins, and supplied their wants, and opened their way to liberty: and their salvation in its full latitude, far exceeded in love and power, that which Israel experienced when brought up out of Egypt. Since that time of mercy, he has guided and guarded them: they have fed upon the Bread of heaven, and drunk water from the wells of salvation. But though many of them have been mercifully preserved from scandalous offences; yet how often have they grieved his Holy Spirit, and provoked his chastening rod! Frequently they have been discontented with their temporal provision, and “craved meat for their lusts:” they have secretly murmured at his appointments, and distrusted his power and love; they have limited him to their methods, and doubted whether he could otherwise provide or deliver! Alas! we have all provoked him by our unbelief, forgetfulness, and ingratitude; and have often been chastened, by having our inordinate desires granted in anger. Severe afflictions have been necessary to recover us from our backslidings; and though we were not mere hypocrites in returning to the Lord, yet we have soon forgotten the salutary lesson: if our hearts have perhaps been sincere, yet they have not been stedfast with him. So that “it is of the Lord's mercies, that we are not consumed” with our fellow-sinners; and we have cause to review, with shame and gratitude, every stage of our journey through the wilderness. And when we shall come to our inheritance, how shall we admire the Lord's patience and mercy, who led us forth like a flock, safely, and without cause of fear; who destroyed our enemies, and brought us, through every intervening difficulty, to the “purchased possession” of his heavenly kingdom! Then indeed we shall no more distrust or dishonour our God; we shall no more rebel or be ungrateful. In the mean time we should walk humbly and watchfully; trusting only in his mercy, and cheerfully submitting to the discipline and chastisement, which our remaining perverseness renders necessary; and praying daily and ferthine inheritance; ^cthy holy temple have they defiled; ^dthey have laid Jerusalem on heaps.

vently that we may profit by all our trials, our miscarriages, and our mercies.

V. 55—72.

The power and mercy of God have been as conspicuous, in preserving the church at large from being ruined by intestine corruptions, as in protecting her against external violence. Her history, from the first promise to fallen Adam, to the coming of the Redeemer, has appeared to be a constant succession of gracious interpositions of God in her behalf, requited with continual rebellions and apostasies. Often did the Lord pour contempt upon the externals, in which his professing people confided; and even delivered “the ark of his glory and strength” into captivity, and suffered their priests to be massacred by the heathen: yet in due time he arose again for their help, and put their enemies to shame, or cast them down into destruction. This appears very remarkably in the history of Israel till the days of David, whom he took from the sheepfolds to rule and feed his people, and to promote their prosperity and religious advantage. And their subsequent history, until the coming of the Son of David, is of the same kind. Then Christianity succeeded to the Mosaic dispensation; and Jerusalem being desolated, the Jews as a nation were deprived of all their distinguished privileges. Under the rule and guidance of the good Shepherd, who feeds his flock with most perfect integrity and skilfulness, one would have expected a better state of affairs: yet the history of the Christian church hitherto has been of the same cast; and nothing but the patience of God could have borne with the abominations, which have prevailed among men who are called by the name of Christ! Nor are matters yet much mended: and the result of all the methods, by which God has made trial of human nature, under every dispensation, confirms his testimony, “that the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked:” and that nothing but a new creation by the power of the Holy Spirit, can cure any of the human race, of their propensity to ungodliness and iniquity. May the Lord then arise as one awaked out of sleep, and put his enemies to a perpetual reproach! may he purify and unite his church; and raise up kings and pastors like David, and like Christ, under whom his work may prosper, and true religion spread throughout the earth! And let us not limit our God: he can do all things, and can easily form proper instruments and make them successful, and render true piety as universal as iniquity has hitherto been.—But let every reader fear the doom of his enemies, and read with reverent attention, in the history of the Egyptians, and of those Israelites whose “days were consumed in vanity and their years in trouble,” the power of the wrath of God against the workers of iniquity. Let us all diligently seek the privileges of his true people, whom he spares and “pities, as a father doth his children;” “for he remembereth, that they are but flesh; a wind that passeth away and cometh not again:” (Notes, ciii. 11—18 :) but let us be careful not to grieve our kind Friend, by distrust and ingratitude, and forgetfulness of his mercies, which will tend to our own loss. And if we would be useful and honourable in our generation, we must learn to stoop, to labour, to deny ourselves, and to be faithful and diligent in lower situations. For persons of this character have often been advanced to more eminent stations: and if as magistrates or ministers they feed the Lord's flock with integrity and skill, by the allowance of candid and liberal men; it will prove no real objection or reproach to them, in the judgment of the wise and holy, though they have been formerly employed with Moses, with Amos, and with David, in tending sheep, with Elisha in following the plow, or with the apostles in the fisherman's boat, or even at the receipt of custom. (Notes, Ex. ii. 16—21. 1 Kings xix. 19—21. Am. vii. 14—17. Matt. iv. 18—22. ix. 9.)

NOTES.

PSALM LXXIX. V. 1—5. This psalm unavoidably leads our thoughts to the Babylonish captivity: yet some think that it was written long before; the Holy Spirit directing the Psalmist thus to furnish the church with proper meditations, in all such seasons of public calamity. (Notes, xlv. lxxiv. Deut. xxxi. 14—23. xxxii.)—When Judah was desolated by hostile armies, the heathen possessed the inheritance which God had given his people. When Jerusalem was taken, the temple was profaned and destroyed; part of the inhabitants were buried in the ruins of the city; and others of them, whose blood was shed abundantly on every side, were left to be devoured by birds and beasts of prey: thus the people of JEHOVAH were exposed to reproach and contempt, because they had provoked him to jealousy by their idolatries: and the pious remnant was led earnestly to enquire, “how long” these calamities, and this triumph of their blaspheming oppressors would continue; and was ready to fear, that the anger and jealousy of the Lord would burn like fire for ever. The case has often been similar, when persecutors and corrupters of the faith have profaned the church, and murdered the saints of God. (Notes, lxxx. 8—13. Jer. viii. 1—3. xxvi. 16—19. Lam. ii. 11, 12. iv. 1—6. Ez. ix. 5—7. Mic. iii. 8—12. Rom. viii. 35—39. Rev. xi. 1—12.)—‘To behold, or even to imagine, heaps of slaughtered bodies, lying unburied and exposed to birds and beasts of prey, is inexpressibly shocking to humanity. But with what unconcern are we accustomed to view, on all sides of us, multitudes “dead in trespasses and sins,” torn in pieces and devoured by wild passions, filthy lusts, and infernal spirits, those dogs and vultures of the moral world! Yet, to a discerning eye and a thinking mind, the latter is by far the more melancholy sight of the two.’ Bp. Horne. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. The Jews deserved their sufferings from God; but their ravagers were extremely unjust, cruel, and impious.—As the church cannot be delivered without the confusion and destruction of implacable persecutors; so we cannot pray for the one, without at least implying the other. (Notes, lxix. 22—28. Is. lxiii. 17—19.) Jeremiah has the same prayer with little variation; but it is not agreed whether he took it from this psalm, or the Psalmist from him; though the latter is most probable. (Note, Jer. x. 23—25.)—The Chaldeans, whose destruction God had foretold, were especially meant: and, so far from worshipping JEHOVAH, they blasphemed him, and cruelly oppressed his worshippers. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Lam. iii. 52—57.)

V. 8—13. The Psalmist does not plead, as in some other places, that his people, though oppressed and persecuted, were free from the guilt of idolatry and other atrocious crimes: (Note, xlv. 9—22:) but, allowing that they

PSALM LXXX.

The Psalmist prays for the tokens of God's special presence with his people, and deprecates his displeasure, 1—7. The former and present state of Israel is represented by a vine, planted, and flourishing heretofore, but now wasted and trodden down, 8—13. A prayer that the Lord would cause this vine again to prosper, 14—19.

To the chief Musician upon *Shoshan-^{a xlv. lx. titles.}

and their fathers had been so criminal as to deserve extirpation, (to which they seemed fast approaching,) he draws all his pleas from the compassion and tender mercies of God; from his regard, or rather zeal, for the honour of his name, which the idolaters would insolently blaspheme, if Israel should be destroyed; from the abject condition to which they were reduced, in which, unless prevented by speedy help, they must perish; from the greatness of JEHOVAH's power; and from the importance of his still having a people to praise his name, to the end of time.—The word rendered “purge away our sins,” means cover them with an atonement.—No sacrifices were offered during the captivity; but this was a prayer for the restoration of the temple and those expiatory oblations, as typifying the great atonement of Christ, which purges away the guilt of all believers, to the praise of the glory of God.—Some expressions towards the close, are like those used by the martyrs and saints in St. John's prophetic vision, or revelation; and it seems obvious to conclude, that the captivity of the church, under the New-Testament Babylon, was specially intended by the Holy Spirit. (Notes, Rev. xviii. 4—8. 11—20. xix. 1—6.)—The plea, taken from the greatness of JEHOVAH's power, exactly resembles that doxology which concludes the Lord's prayer:—“For thine “is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever “and ever. Amen.” (Notes, xxi. 13. Matt. vi. 13.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to be very thankful, that we are not called to “resist unto blood,” and that the murderous rage of persecution is suspended for a season. Yet it is grievous to consider, how many, who are heathens in their tempers and conduct, and in their principles or instructions, occupy most important stations in the visible church, by which “the holy temple is defiled,” and Christianity is exposed to the reproach and scorn of infidels. It is also lamentable, that the horrors and carnage of war are so much known among nations, professing themselves the disciples of “the Prince of peace;” and that ambition and avarice shed the blood of Christians like water on every side, and render Jerusalem, as it were, “a heap of ruins.” (Note, Lam. iv. 1, 2.)—The believer has also continual cause to lament, that in-dwelling sin, and the incursions of temptation, often pollute his body and soul, which are “the “temple of God.”—But every trouble, personal or publick, springs from the anger of God, whom we often provoke to jealousy by our idolatrous attachments to earthly objects. We should therefore first deprecate his wrath, and seek forgiveness of our iniquities; and beseech “the God “of our salvation” to cleanse away the pollution and the guilt of our sin: and then he will prevent us with his tender mercies, and deliver us, however low we may be brought. When our calamities, or those of the church, give occasion to infidels and blasphemers to reproach the gospel, or to enquire, “Where is their God?” we have got a prevailing plea in prayer; for wherefore should persons of this character have cause given them to triumph over the Lord's servants? (Notes, xlii. 1—3. 9, 10. cxv. 1, 2.) But we have no cause to be uneasy on our own account, if we are reproached for our piety or our sufferings: we should chiefly fear being reproached for acting inconsistently with our profession. We ought, however, to pray for the deliverance of the church from the contempt, as well as oppressions, of her enemies; and in so doing, should our desires for their conversion not be granted, our prayers for the church will eventually be answered, in the ruin of all such as “devour Jacob, and lay waste his “dwelling-place.”—The blood of JEHOVAH's servants will at length be avenged seven-fold upon those who shed it, and do not repent; and his wrath will be poured out upon all kingdoms, families, and persons, who have not known or called upon his name. But by the greatness of his power, and for the glory of his name, he will rescue his oppressed people: their sighing in captivity and in imprisonment comes before him; and he will either preserve the lives of those whom persecutors appoint to die, or he will receive them to glory. So that the harmless “sheep “of his pasture will give him thanks for ever,” according to the desire of their hearts; a succession of believers shall praise him to all generations; and the cause of God, however now run down, will finally triumph upon earth, as well as eternally in heaven.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXX. Title. (Marg. Ref.) Many are of opinion, that this psalm was written, at the time when Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar: but some think, that it relates to the desolations made by Sennacherib. The reasons for the latter opinion are, that after the destruction of the city and temple by Nebuchadnezzar, God no longer “dwelt between the cherubim,” above the mercy-seat (1); for the ark and the mercy-seat, and the cherubim of gold, were destroyed, and never replaced: nor is the Lord, ever after that event, thus spoken of in Scripture; but Hezekiah, praying against Sennacherib, addressed God by this very title. (Is. xxxvii. 16, 17.)—The Septuagint also expressly call this, “A psalm concerning the Assyrian.” Again, Ephraim and Manasseh (2), seem to have had but little concern in the affairs of Judah, at the time of the Babylonish captivity: but during the reign of Hezekiah, many of these, and the other tribes constituting the kingdom of Israel, accepted of his invitation, joined the Jews in keeping the passover, and afterwards assisted in breaking down the idolatrous high places and altars, not only in Judah, and in Benjamin as connected with Judah; but likewise in Ephraim and Manasseh. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxx. xxxi. 1.)—Yet soon after, Sennacherib invaded the land, reduced the remnant of the ten tribes to abject slavery, invaded Judah, and threatened to destroy Jerusalem and the temple. It was therefore natural, at this crisis, to implore, that God would stir up his strength, and come to save Judah; and thus shew his glory,

^b GIVE ear, ° O Shepherd of Israel, thou that ^d leadest Joseph like a flock: thou that ° dwellest between the cherubims, ^f shine forth.

It produces a large quantity of luxuriant branches, which not only yield no grapes, but must be pruned away, or they will hinder those upon the fruitful branches from ripening. Thus mere professors of Christianity are branches of the true Vine, which must be taken away and cast into the fire, in order that true believers may become more abundantly fruitful. (Notes, John xv. 1—8.)—Goodly cedars. (10) “Cedars of God.” Marg. (Note, civ. 16.)

V. 14, 15. (Marg. Ref.) The family of David, (which God had advanced and prospered for the good of Israel, and for his own glory,) as typical of Christ, was perhaps meant by this Branch. Yet Christ himself, even the promised Messiah, seems to have been principally intended. The Septuagint translate it, ‘The Son of man’ (17).—The clause may be literally rendered, “The son, whom thou hast made strong for thyself.” (Note, lxxxix. 19—37.) ‘The Chaldee Paraphrast expounds the Branch of ‘Messiah himself, ... ‘On King Messiah, whom thou hast ‘established, &c.’ So do the Rabbies, Aben Ezra, and ‘Obadiah, cited by Dr. Hammond. ... To the advent of ‘this Son of man, Israel was ever accustomed to look forward in time of affliction; on his second and glorious ‘advent the Christian church must fix her eye, in the day ‘of her calamities.’ Bp. Horne.

V. 16. The vine, above described, (or the nation which God had brought out of Egypt, and planted in Canaan,) was in great measure cut down and burned with fire, by the dispersion of the ten tribes, and the success of the Assyrians in Judah: and though a remnant still remained, and a strong branch of David’s race; yet if the anger of God were not turned away from them, they likewise must soon perish. (Notes, 2 Kings xix. 4. 30, 31.)

V. 17, 18. This may imply a request that God would uphold, strengthen, and defend his king, of David’s race, on the throne of Judah, for the protection of his people and the maintenance of true religion. (Note, 2 Kings xix. 14—19.) But “the Man of God’s right hand,” and “the Son of man,” point out the promised Messiah very clearly, and may be considered as a prayer of the church for his coming, as “the power of God,” for the conversion of sinners, and the salvation of his people. (Note, 14, 15.) Those who refer the Psalm to the Babylonish captivity, interpret the preceding verse of the subversion of the kingdom, in the family of David after the death of Josiah; and these verses as a prayer for another king of the same race to be advanced to the throne, in order that the people might be induced and encouraged to adhere to the worship of God, and to call on him in every time of trouble.—Quicken us. (18) Make us to live, or to be lively. (Notes, xxii. 29. cxix. 25. Eph. ii. 4—10.)

V. 19. An increase of earnestness in prayer seems discernible, in comparing the three repetitions of this important request. (3. 7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

He, who dwells on the mercy-seat, is the good Shepherd of his people, and leads them as a valued flock with all attention and tenderness. In all troubles and dangers let us beseech him to “shine upon our souls,” and upon our path, that we may be cheered and directed by his presence and favour: and let us intreat him continually to “stir up his strength, and come” and save us. But we can neither expect the comforts of his love, nor the protection of his powerful arm, except we are partakers of his converting grace. When we discover our need of this invaluable blessing, we ought to pray earnestly for it: the same must be our conduct, when we have lost our comfort, and are exposed to rebukes by having relapsed into sin, and are become sensible of the necessity of returning to the Lord our Rest: (Notes, li. 10. 12, 13. cxvi. 7.) and in all public calamities, whether of churches or nations, we must observe the same order, and pray that they may be prepared by conversion, for returning comfort and prosperity.—The Lord is really angry at the prayers of the hypocrite, who employs them as a cloke for his iniquity: but not with those of any sinner, however vile, who sincerely seeks his mercy and grace. (Note, Prov. xv. 8, 9.) Yet, while he proves our sincerity, and increases our humility and fervency, by delays; we often think that he is angry against our prayers, and will not accept them: but we shall certainly find the contrary, if we persevere in asking and seeking.—The church of God in times of grievous oppressions, and the believer in times of darkness and distress, (especially when occasioned by sin,) may for a while be sunk in sorrows, and exposed to contempt and reproach: but when this leads to repentance, having sown in tears they will reap in more abundant joy. (Notes, cxxvi. 5, 6. Matt. v. 4. 2 Cor. vii. 8—11.)—When we, in this favoured land, consider our manifold advantages, and our very disproportionate improvement of them, we shall perceive great cause for humiliation. We are planted, as in a well cultivated enclosure, with every means of being fruitful in the works of righteousness: but alas! the useless leaves of profession, and the empty boughs of notions and forms, abound far more, than substantial piety and charity. The Christian religion also, as planted by the apostles and primitive evangelists, took deep root, and spread very wide, so that it has filled many nations; but it has too generally proved an empty vine. The Lord's zeal for the honour of his own truth, precepts, and ordinances, may be pleaded with him as a reason, why he should not break down the hedges, and permit infidels, and hereticks, and persecutors, to root up the vineyard; and may suggest an enquiry why he permits them so long to practise and prosper. But when we consider the state of the purest parts of the visible church, we cannot wonder that we are visited with sharp corrections. He, however, who is not only the strongest Branch, but the Root and Stem of the vine; who is "the Man of God's right hand," "the Son of man whom" the Father "hath made so strong for himself;" has been carried through his work for his church, and is possessed of all power in heaven and earth for her benefit. The vine cannot therefore be ruined, nor can any fruitful branch perish: but the unfruitful will be cut off and cast into the fire. Let us then come to him and abide in him, "without whom we can do nothing;" let us beg of him to uphold and strengthen us, that we may not go back from him; and let us still call upon his name, in behalf of ourselves and of the whole church: "Turn us again, O LORD God of Hosts; cause thy face to shine, and we shall be saved."

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXI. V. 1—5. It is probable, that this psalm was composed in the time of David, when the ark had been removed to mount Zion; and that it was especially intended for the new moons, and that in particular which began the seventh month, called the feast of trumpets, or the new year according to the old computation. (Notes, Ex. xii. 2. Lev. xxiii. 24, 25. Num. x. 2—10. xxix. 1—6.) Some think, that on this day Moses came down from the mount the second time, with the tables of the law, and full orders to erect a tabernacle, in the most sacred place of which these tables might be placed, in the ark of the covenant, and covered with the mercy-seat, over which the glory of God, as dwelling among his people was displayed; and that this day was observed as a memorial of that event, and a testimony of the relation which subsisted between God and Israel.—The word rendered "Psalm (2)," may signify the instruments of psalmody, some of which are afterwards enumerated.—'Joseph's family was counted the chief before that Judah was preferred.' No doubt the descendants of Joseph were counted the chief, during most of the time, that the Israelites continued in Egypt; as Joseph had there been the protector of the whole family.—God went through the land of Egypt destroying all the first born; or against the land (marg.) in all the plagues which he inflicted: (Notes, Ex. xi. 4, 5. xii. 11—14. 29, 30:) yet the feast of trumpets did not take place till almost seven months after Israel left Egypt; for their deliverance was in some sense incomplete, till Moses descended the second time from the mount, with the tokens of God's reconciliation to his offending people.—In the last clause, the Psalmist evidently speaks in the name of the nation, or the church of God, as a corporate body from age to age. It seems that the Israelites did not understand the language of their haughty oppressors, which must have tended to render their bondage more distressing. (Notes, cxiv. 1, 2. Gen. xlii. 23.)

V. 6. It is evident that the Lord himself speaks, through the remainder of the psalm, though the change of person is not noticed. Some suppose, that the voice of God, with which Israel in Egypt was unacquainted, was meant by "the language which he understood not (5);" and then this and the following verses may be considered as a recapitulation of the messages of God to the nation, by Moses, during the events attending its deliverance.—God then said concerning Israel, "I remove his shoulder, &c."—It is not certain what is meant by the word (רִי) translated "the pots:" whether any earthen vessels which the Israelites were employed to make; or the kilns in which the bricks were burnt, or baskets used in their work; (marg.) or the pots, in which the food for this immense number of slaves was prepared, the flesh pots which they afterwards regretted. (Note, Ex. xvi. 1—3.)

V. 7. (Marg. Ref.) The secret place, &c.] Some think that this refers to the cloudy pillar, from the hidden recess of which JEHOVAH spake in mercy to his people, and in thunder to his enemies. (Notes, xcix. 6, 7.) But perhaps mount Sinai is meant, from whose inaccessible summit, out of the midst of the thunder and lightning the Lord spake the ten commandments, the first of which is afterwards referred to. (10. Notes, Ex. xix. xx.)—I proved thee, &c.] Notes, Ex. xvii. 1—7. Num. xx. 2—13.

V. 8—10. The old translation of these verses seems as literal as the present version, and more expressive.—“Hear, “O my people, and I will protest unto thee: O Israel, if “thou wilt hearken unto me, and wilt have no strange god “in thee, neither worship any strange god; (For I am the “LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of “Egypt;) open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it.” “If thou adherest to the worship of JEHOVAH alone, according to the terms of the national covenant; I will grant the largest desires of thy heart, and requests of thy lips.”—According to the present translation of the ninth verse, the future is evidently put for the imperative, as is the case with several of the ten commandments; and it means “Let no strange God, &c.” “There will be no need; I will abundantly supply all thy wants.” The larger their desires and expectations were, and the more copious and comprehensive their prayers, the more abundantly would they receive from the all-sufficiency of God.—It is almost impossible not to think in this place of our Lord's address to the Jews, “If any man thirst, let him come unto me “and drink.” (Marg. Ref.—Note, John vii. 37—39.)—The former part of the tenth verse may perhaps be rendered; “I, JEHOVAH, who brought thee out of the land “of Egypt, am thy God.” “With such an omnipotent and all-sufficient Protector and Friend, thou canst not want any other god.” (Notes, Ex. xx. 7—9. 17—22.)

V. 11, 12. Israel, as a nation, were the people of God, by profession, covenant, and the strongest obligations; but they were not so by their own choice of him. They would not have him for their Portion, and their Lord; but expected more advantages from their dumb idols than from him: and therefore they were left to be judicially deceived, hardened, and ruined, as the just punishment of their sins.—Thus wisdom (that is, Christ) complains, “They would “none of my counsel, they despised all my reproof;” and this was the cause of their destruction. (Notes, Prov. i. 20—33. Acts vii. 37—43. Rom. i. 24—27. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12.)

V. 13. (Notes, Deut. v. 28, 29. xxxii. 29.) Such expressions denote the Lord's willingness to receive returning sinner, and the delight which he takes in shewing mercy and doing good, and in the faith and obedience of his people: and they prove, that the ruin of sinners is altogether the effect of their own pride and obstinacy. But it would be absurd to draw inferences from them, which cannot consist with other parts of Scripture. (Notes, Is. xlviii. 17—19, Ez. xviii. 23. xxxiii. 11. 1 Tim. ii. 3, 4.)—“One “cannot help observing the similitude between the complaint here uttered, and one which hath been since “breathed forth over the same people; “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem... how often would I have gathered thy children “together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under “her wings, and ye would not!”’ Bp. Horne. (Note, Matt. xxiii. 37—39.)

V. 14, 15. ‘I should in a short time have quelled all ‘their enemies; and by one victory after another have quite ‘destroyed their adversaries. ... All that maligned their ‘prosperity, and set themselves against the design of the ‘LORD to make them victorious over their enemies, should ‘have been so daunted, that they should have dissembled ‘their inward hatred, and been forced, at least, to a counterfeit submission: but his people should have seen ‘blessed days, and enjoyed a substantial and durable happiness, without any interruption.’ Bp. Patrick.—The nation of Israel, if they had been obedient, would have possessed their privileges to the coming of Christ, and have been then incorporated into his church, which shall continue on earth to the end of time, and in heaven to all eternity.—Submitted. (15) “Lied.” Marg. (Note, lvi. 1—3.)

V. 16. Marg. Ref.—Notes, Deut. xxxii. 13, 14.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is our duty and privilege to attend on the ordinances of God, and to abound in praise and thanksgiving: and we should excite one another to these pleasant services, embracing every opportunity for them, and improving all our ability in them. For the Lord is the Strength of his people; and all the worship, which we can render, is far beneath his glorious excellences, and our immense obligations to him, especially in our redemption from wrath and sin. When therefore he commands this reasonable service, and intimates his acceptance of it, he testifies his mercy and condescending love to us. For we ought never to forget the base and ruinous drudgery to which Satan had reduced us; or our rebellions against God, for which we deserved to be left the bond-slaves of this cruel tyrant, and to have our final portion with him. But when in distress of conscience we are led to cry for deliverance, the Lord answers our prayers, and sets us at liberty.—As the giving of the law from mount Sinai, and the trials of Israel in the wilderness, were proofs of the Lord's peculiar regard to that people; so humiliating convictions of sin, and sharp afflictions, are generally, and the law written in our heart is always, evidential of the love of God to our souls.—But he speaks to multitudes, both by the awful requirements and sanctions of his law, and by the invitations and promises of his gospel, and even to many who profess themselves his people, who yet will not hearken to his voice, or have him for their Portion; for they foolishly expect more satisfaction from their sins, than from the all-sufficient God. Thus they provoke him to give them up to their own heart's lust, and to leave them to their perverse choice: and then, whilst they prosper in wickedness, and are envied by their fellow sinners, they ripen apace for eternal ruin. But the Lord delights in the conversion of sinners, and in the faith and obedience of his people. They may desire and ask as much as they will; and he will answer and exceed their expectations: their enemies shall be subdued; and their souls satisfied with those unspeakable blessings, which flow from "the Rock of salvation:" their bodies also shall be fed with "food convenient for them," and their eternal inheritance secured to them; while all the haters of the Lord shall fall under his power, and perish for ever. May he then incline our hearts to obey his call, and walk in his ways: and may he enlarge and assist our prayers; that, being delivered from our enemies, we may "open our mouths wide," both in fervent, and copious, and large requests, and take in abundantly the waters of life and salvation, and so to drink and live for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXII. V. 1. JEHOVAH, who judges the principalities and powers of the invisible world, will call to account the greatest of those, who exercise dominion over their fellow-creatures on earth. "He judgeth in the midst of gods." Rulers seem as gods to their subjects, and they indeed are the Lord's appointed vicegerents: (Notes, 6, 7. Rom. xiii. 1—7:) but they are the subjects of his kingdom, even as other men; and he is especially at all times present in their courts, to animadvert on the justice or injustice of their decisions; to receive appeals from their sentence, when unrighteous; and to call them to a strict account if they abuse their power. (Marg. Ref.)—It is not known by whom, or when, this psalm was written: some date it in David's time, and others in that of Hezekiah.

V. 2—4. 'Is it not time to leave off your partiality; and no longer to favour a bad cause, because the man is rich and great; and can either give you a large bribe, if you will judge it for him, or do you a mischief if you give sentence against him? Your duty is to do equal justice to all men that come before you; and to take a particular care, that the poor and the fatherless do not suffer because they have no money to give, nor any friend to solicit.' Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lviii. 1, 2. Ex. xxiii. 6—9. 2 Chr. xix. 5—11.) 'Every upright judge will endeavour to resemble the Redeemer. For this purpose, he will be always willing to admit, diligent to discuss, solicitous to expedite the cause of a poor and injured person, and to afford such a one the speediest, the cheapest, and the most effectual redress, equally despising the offers of opulence, and the frowns of power.' Bp. Horne. (Notes, lxxii. 1—7. 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4.)—Do justice, &c. (3) "Justify the afflicted, &c." (Note, Prov. xvii. 5.)

V. 5. 'They will not study the laws of God; or if they do, will not think it their interest to be governed by them; ... insomuch, that the foundations of the kingdom, which are justice and truth, are shaken; all things are in confusion, and in danger to come to utter ruin. Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref.—Note, lxxv. 3.)

V. 6, 7. The rulers of Israel, as immediately appointed by JEHOVAH to be his representatives, to judge according to his law, and to be types of his Anointed, were especially honoured with this high title, "Ye are gods;" in which other magistrates share, in proportion to their religious advantages. But though outwardly honoured as "gods," as "children of the most High," and as representing the Son of God himself; yet, seeing they in general abused these distinctions, the Lord would soon shew them their weakness, as mean mortal men; and leave them to be cast down from their dignity, like one of the princes whom Israel crushed when they came up out of Egypt, or in their subsequent wars. (lxxxiii. 6—11. Notes, John x. 32—39.)

V. 8. 'Seeing none amendment, he desireth God to undertake the matter, and execute justice himself.'—This verse, however, is evidently a prophetic prayer for the coming of the Messiah, and the conversion of the nations to him. (Notes, ii. 7—9. lxxii. 8—11. lxxxvi. 9, 10. xcvi. 7—9. Rev. xi. 15—18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The authority of God should be acknowledged, honoured, and submitted to, in those governors whom his providence places over us. But they also must be reminded, that they are only viceroys of the King of heaven, bound under the strictest obligations, and the most awful responsibility, to do his will, and copy his example; that he witnesses the use which they make of their authority, and will judge them for it; and that if, with present impunity, they "judge unjustly and accept the persons of the wicked," they will have a most terrible sentence denounced on them at last.—These plain truths are too generally forgotten or discredited by those in authority: they know not, because they "will not understand;" therefore they walk on still in darkness: (Note, John iii. 19—21:) and the perversion of law and justice, through their impiety and iniquity, subverts the foundations of social felicity, and enhances exceedingly the miseries of mankind. (Notes, xi. 1—3. xiv. 1—7. Mic. vii. 1—4.) God has indeed honoured rulers, (especially those placed over his people,) by entrusting to them, as it were, a share of his authority; and favouring them, as children, with a portion of his inheritance: and honourable and happy are they, who, out of a regard to him, "defend the poor and fatherless," do justice to the afflicted and needy, and deliver them out of the hands of the wicked.—But as for ungodly rulers, their disgrace and misery will equal their present abused distinctions; and they will feel the insignificance of that pre-eminence, which made them forget that they were men, when death shall arrest them and hurry them to judgment; and they shall be condemned with those princes who made war against Israel of old.—We should, however, be thankful for the blessings of civil government, which, with all its defects, is of immense advantage to mankind. And we should pray for our rulers, and leave such as misbehave to the judgment of God, and be thankful for our peculiar advantages in this respect. But, considering the state of affairs in the world, from the beginning hitherto, we have need even on that account, to pray most earnestly and constantly, that the Lord Jesus would arise and take possession of his inheritance, and rule over all nations, in truth, and righteousness, and peace.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXIII. V. 1—5. It is generally and with probability conjectured, that this psalm was written, (perhaps by some of Asaph's descendants,) in the reign of Jehoshaphat, when a most formidable confederacy was formed against him; and when Judah was invaded by a very large army composed of many nations, of whom the Moabites and Ammonites seem to have been the principal, and the others their allies: and it appears, that enmity to God and religion, stirred up by Jehoshaphat's zeal for reformation, had a considerable effect in exciting them against him. (Notes, 2 Chr. xx. 1—4.) So that it was, in fact, the cause of God which they opposed; uniting crafty policy with powerful exertions, entirely to destroy his people, and to blot out the memorial of them from the earth. (Notes, Esth. iii. 6—15.) The term "hidden ones" seems to denote the Lord's peculiar people, who were hidden under his immediate protection from the devices of their enemies. (Marg. Ref. g.)—Some render the words, "hidden things," understanding them of the treasures reposed in the treasuries of the temple.

V. 6—8. (Marg. Ref.) Assur (or the Assyrians,) was called in by the other confederates, as a powerful ally, to ensure the destruction of the hated nation. (Note, 2 Kings xv. 19, 20.)

9 Do unto them ^a as unto the Midianites ; ^r as to Sisera, as to Jabin, at the brook ^s of Kison :

10 Which perished at ^t En-dor : they became ^u as dung for the earth.

11 Make their nobles like ^v Oreb, and like Zeeb : yea, all their princes as ^w Zebah, and as Zalmunna :

12 Who said, ^x Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession.

13 ^y O my God, make them ^z like a wheel ; ^a as the stubble before the wind.

14 ^b As the fire burneth the wood,

and as ^c the flame setteth the mountains on fire ;

15 So ^d persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm.

16 ^e Fill their faces with shame ; that they may seek thy name, O LORD.

17 ^f Let them be confounded and troubled for ever ; yea, let them be put to shame, and perish :

18 ^g That men may know that thou, whose name alone is JEHOVAH, art ^h the most High over all the earth.

V. 9—11. (Notes, Judg. iv—viii.) Endor lay in the north of Canaan, near the place in which Sisera's army was destroyed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. "The houses of God" seem to denote, not only the temple and its out-buildings, but also the palaces and houses, in which the princes, priests, and chief persons of God's people dwelt. It is not certain, that any buildings for the public worship of God (like the synagogues of later ages,) were at this time erected. (Note, lxxiv. 7, 8.) But perhaps these idolaters might consider the high places as houses of God, especially such as were not used in idolatry. (Note, 2 Kings xviii. 22.)

V. 13—18. These verses must be interpreted as a prayer, and not merely as a prediction : but it should be observed, that the persons prayed against were the enemies and haters of God, who sought with implacable malice to extirpate his people, and destroy true religion ; and that the honour of God, and the interests of truth and righteousness, as well as the preservation of Israel, required this example of severity. The images employed are very striking, and are best explained by the marginal references. The expression "that they may seek thy name" implies, that the imprecation was only meant, in the strongest sense, on the supposition that the invaders remained incorrigible in enmity to God, in which case, "let them be confounded and troubled for ever," that men of other nations may take warning, and learn by their doom, that JEHOVAH, the God of Israel, is alone the almighty Lord and Sovereign of the whole earth, and not merely the local Deity of one nation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Enmity to the holiness and authority of God is the real cause of the hatred borne to his people. Men of different nations, interests, parties, humours, and sentiments, readily unite against the church. The formal self-righteous Pharisee, the time-serving Herodian, and the infidel Sadducee, agreed to hate and oppose Christ : Herod and Pilate, though before at enmity, were made friends, as being of one mind to treat Jesus with contempt : (Notes, Matt. xvi. 1—4, v. 1. xxii. 15—33. Luke xxiii. 6—12 :) and hypocrisy and profaneness, superstition and scepticism, and even enthusiasm and atheism often confederate against his humbling doctrine and holy cause. For the consultation has been from the beginning, how to extirpate the church, that neither preacher nor professor of the truth should be left, and "that the name of Israel should be had no more in remembrance." (Notes, Acts v. 17—28.) But whatever arrogance, tumult, subtlety, or resolution, may be found among those who hate the Lord, and would lay hands on his worshippers, and "take to themselves his houses in possession ;" their intentions must ultimately be frustrated. His people, whose "life is hid with Christ in God," and whose excellency is equally hidden from the carnal eye, are safe under his protection. (Note, Col. iii. 1—4.)—While the Lord is still and keeps silence, and persecutors insult and triumph, the apparent danger often excites believers to great fervency in prayer ; and then in due time he arises to plead their cause : so that the doom of the ancient enemies of the church, or one even more dreadful, will be that of all others to the end of the world. For such are "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction," even as a bowl is fitted to roll impetuously down a declivity ; as stubble to be driven before a vehement wind ; or as the dry wood, thorns, and brambles upon the mountains, are fitted to be consumed by the flames. (Note, Luke xxiii. 26—31, v. 31.) Thus the stormy tempest of divine vengeance will persecute them with dreadful consternation into "the fire prepared for the devil and his angels ;" unless they be so humbled, and ashamed of their sins, as to repent and seek the pardoning mercy of their offended Lord : for assuredly all impenitent sinners shall be troubled, and ashamed, and perish for ever.—The Lord will be glorified in the punishments which he inflicts : if present judgments fail of bringing those who suffer them to repentance, they are often so evidential of his power and justice, as to warn others to flee from his wrath and seek his favour : and doubtless the final punishment of the wicked will answer most important purposes, throughout the universal and everlasting kingdom of God. But may we so know, that "he whose name is JEHOVAH, is most high over all the earth," as to fear his powerful wrath, seek his inestimable favour, trust his mercy and grace, and yield ourselves to be his willing and devoted worshippers and servants : and may we chiefly seek the destruction of those tumultuous and confederated enemies, our "fleshly lusts, which war against the soul."

NOTES

PSALM LXXXIV. V. 1, 2. It is not said, by whom, or on what occasion, this psalm was written; but it is generally thought, that David composed it, when driven from Jerusalem by Absalom's rebellion. (Notes, xlii. xliii. lxiii.) Yet this is by no means certain: and some think that it was written by some pious Levite, in the days of Hezekiah, when kept from the temple by the Assyrian army.—The Psalmist, however, reflecting with regret on the beauties of the sanctuary from which he was banished, and the delight which he had taken in attending on the ordinances there administered, not only breaks out in the language of strong and ardent desire, to be restored to the courts of God; but declares that his soul so earnestly longed after the living God himself, and the enjoyment of his love, that his body also was affected by it. (Notes, lxxiii. 23—28. cxix. 19—21. 81, 82. Cant. ii. 5. v. 8.) Or he may mean, that he longed to “present his body as a “living sacrifice,” by such external acts of worship, as would most suitably express the fervent affections of his soul.—Living God. (2) Notes, Josh. iii. 10—13. 1 Sam. xvii. 25, 26. Jer. x. 9, 10. Dan. vi. 25—28. 1 Thes. i. 9, 10.

V. 3. The Psalmist seems here to envy the birds their privilege of building their nests at, or near to, the altars of God; (meaning the tabernacle or temple, where were the altar of burnt-offering and the altar of incense;) while he was driven as an exile to a great distance from them. Yet, as it can scarcely be conceived, that the birds were left unmolested in their nests to hatch and brood their young, at the altar of God, in the days of David or Hezekiah; it has been supposed, that ne only meant, that the birds found in their nests that tranquillity, repose, and satisfaction, which the ordinances of God had afforded him, but of which he was now deprived. (Note, Matt. viii. 18—20.)—My King, &c.] Notes, xlv. 4. xlv. 1. cxlv. 1, 2. Matt. xxv. 34—40, v. 34.

V. 4. Some of the priests and Levites dwelt continually at the sanctuary, which to a carnal mind might appear a wearisome confinement: but the Psalmist deemed them very happy; and those also who resided so near to the courts of God, that they could constantly join in the praises and adorations there presented, and who counted this their delightful employment. (Notes, 10. xxvi. 6—8. xxvii. 4—6. lxv. 4. cxxxiv, cxxxv. 1—3. 1 Chr. xvi. 37—43.) The Septuagint render the latter clause; Εἰς τὰς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων ἀνεστῶσι σε, “They will praise thee for ever and ever,” the strongest term for eternity contained in the Greek language; and no doubt the Psalmist counted those happy who perpetually praised God at the sanctuary on earth; because this was both a preparation for the eternal worship of heaven, and an earnest of it. (Notes, xxx. 11, 12. cxlv. 1, 2. cxlvi. 2.)

V. 5. (Notes, 11, 12. i. 1—3. xxxii. 1, 2. cxix. 1.) ‘Happy also is that man, (how mean soever his outward condition be,) who, relying on the divine protection, (Ex. xxxiv. 24,) goes up three times a year to the solemn feasts at Jerusalem; or when he is debarred that liberty, as I now am, is one of those devout persons, whose hearts are more in the high ways that lead thither, than at their own home.’ Bp. Patrick.—The man, who trusting in God for strength and protection, pressed through dangers and difficulties, from cordial love to the courts of God, aptly represented those, who, being strong in the Lord, walk with alacrity in his ways, aspiring after and longing for the joys of heaven. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Phil. iii. 12—14. 20, 21.)

V. 6, 7 The valley of Baca, or ‘of mulberry-trees,’ was a barren place; so that they which passed through must dig pits for water; signifying that no lets can hinder them, that are fully bent to come to Christ’s church; neither yet that God will ever fail them.—Some translate “Baca,” weeping: and probably it was a dreary valley, through which from some parts of the land the people must pass, in going up to Jerusalem: but in one way or other, those, who from regard to the ordinances of God encountered the difficulty, were carried well through it. They pass it as cheerfully, as if it abounded in pleasant springs; and depending on God, as the Fountain of what they want, receive from him the blessing of plentiful and seasonable showers to refresh them on their journey. So that the whole company go from stage to stage with unwearied vigour.’ Bp. Patrick.—The word (בְּקָעָה) rendered “pools,” signifies also blessings. (Notes, Is. xliii. 14—21, v. 19, 20. were enabled to proceed with increasing vigour and alacrity, till each of them appeared before God in his courts on mount Zion; or, till "the God of gods appeared to them "in Zion," manifesting his glory and communicating spiritual blessings through his holy ordinances. (Notes, Job xvii. 8, 9. Is. xl. 27-31.)—The whole description may be properly accommodated to the Christian's pilgrimage, through this vale of tears to the felicity of heaven.

V. 8, 9. The power of the LORD God of hosts to repel every enemy, and remove every obstacle, and his readiness to hear the requests of the patriarch Jacob and his descendants, encouraged the Psalmist's earnest prayer, to be permitted, according to the desire of his heart, to return to the courts of God. (Notes, Gen. xxxii. 9-12. 24-30. Hos. xii. 3-6.)—He also intreated him to "look on "the face of his Anointed,"—his Messiah,—his Christ, the king, as the type of Christ. If David wrote this psalm, he might mean to request God, that he would favour his king, whom he had expressly chosen, and ordered to be anointed; and not suffer a rebel and an usurper to prevail against him. (Notes, ii. 1-6.) But he is generally supposed to have looked forward to the promised Messiah, of whom he was the type and progenitor: and indeed he might plead this as a powerful argument, why the Lord should rescue him from his enemies, that the Messiah was to descend from him; and he might expect that the root should be preserved for the sake of that illustrious Branch. (Notes, Is. vi. 13. vii. 2. lxxv. 8-10. Matt. xxiv. 21, 22.)

V. 10. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1, 2. Luke ii. 41-52. Rom. viii. 5-9. Rev. iii. 12, 13.) "I would rather ° choose to be in the lowest and basest room in thy holy ° tabernacle, than to be settled in whatsoever dignity out ° of the bounds of thy church." Bp. Hall.

V. 11, 12. The sun enlightens, warms, enlivens, and fructifies the face of the earth: thus the Lord gives light, comfort, and fruitfulness to those, on whom he shines with the beams of his saving grace. This sun may indeed be clouded or eclipsed; but it remains unchanged, and will soon burst forth again, as if with increasing splendour. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. Mal. iv. 2, 3. John viii. 12. Rev. xxi. 22-27.)—In this world the Lord gives "grace," which he, as a Sun, ripens into "glory" in the world above: (Notes, lxxiii. 23-28. Rom. v. 1, 2 :) while as a Shield, he protects the happy man who trusts in him, against all assailants, however formidable; and withholds nothing truly good from any who walk before him in uprightness of heart. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. xv. 1. Deut. xxxiii. 29. 2 Sam. xii. 8. Matt. vi. 33, 34. 1 Tim. iv. 6-10.)—This the Psalmist knew, which cheered his spirits amidst his tribulations, and while he waited the answer to his prayers: and he concludes with most emphatically declaring that man happy, however poor or persecuted, tempted or afflicted, who trusted in the Lord.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

Divine ordinances are the believer's solace in this evil world; because in them he communes with "the living "God," and enjoys his gracious presence. (Notes, cxxii. 1, 2. Is. lviii. 13, 14.) This renders his tabernacles so amiable in his eyes, and dear to his heart: this causes him to value the privilege of attending them; and to regret, as the greatest calamity, the banishment or confinement from them. Indeed the Lord himself is "the Rest" of his people; (Notes, xc. 1, 2. xci. 1, 2. cxvi. 7;) but on earth, they cannot approach him, except through his appointed means of grace: so that these are to their souls, as the nest to the bird, which resorts thither and is contented and easy, but is unsettled when absent: yet this is only an earnest of the happiness of heaven, where the blessed inhabitants are always praising their God. But how can they dream of entering that holy habitation, and sharing its pure pleasures and society, who complain of the worship of God on earth as a tedious and wearisome task? (Note, Am. viii. 4-10, v. 5 :) who think those wretched, that spend all their days in his service; because they share not the carnal pleasure and dissipation, which they themselves prefer to the employment of angels? But not only are those happy, who have arrived at heaven: they likewise may be congratulated, who have set out, with the desire of their hearts, in the search and pursuit of that felicity; and who, making the Lord their Strength, walk with pleasure in his ways and approve them in their hearts. They may have to pass through many a valley of weeping, and many a thirsty desert: but wells of salvation shall be opened for them, and consolations sent for their support. The journey itself, and the prospect of its happy end, will revive their hearts; they shall go from strength to strength, with increasing cheerfulness and confidence, till every one of them arrives safe in the holy city, to appear before God, to see him as he is, and to be for ever with him, and like unto him. (Note, 1 John iii. 1-3.) May the Lord then incline the heart of every one of us to set out and proceed with alacrity in this pilgrimage, and may he defend us through it: may we pray without ceasing, (through the great Mediator, "the Lord's Anointed," whose face he beholds, and whose intercession he delights in,) for ourselves and for all our fellow-travellers. Thus we shall learn to count one day in the courts of God better than a thousand spent elsewhere; to value the little time which we have employed with him, more than all the rest of our lives; and to deem the meanest place in his service preferable to the highest preferments in the tents, or even in the palaces, of the ungodly. If we do not choose in this manner, we are carnally-minded; and “to be carnally-minded is death.” But what can all the honours, riches, and distinctions of the world do for us, compared with the blessings of his favour, who is a “Sun and a Shield?” If he gives us grace here and glory hereafter, he will not withhold any thing truly good from us. He has not indeed engaged to give riches and temporal dignities; but he has promised to give grace and glory to every one, who seeks them in his appointed way; and he delights in fulfilling this promise. What is grace, but heaven begun below, in the knowledge, love, and service of God? What is glory, but the completion of this felicity, in perfect conformity to him, and the full enjoyment of him for ever? And if he has begun to give us grace, his grace will be sufficient for us, and will certainly ripen into glory. Let us then seek this true happiness; and desire to be fruitful, through the benign influences of the Sun of righteousness, as well as safe and cheerful under the protection of “the Shield of salvation.” Let us study to walk uprightly in his ways, and to trust in his mercies: let us thankfully receive what he gives, and be well satisfied to be without what he withholds, or takes away; for we may be sure that he sees it evil for us: and let us hold it fast, as an indisputable principle, notwithstanding all possible tribulation, that the man is happy, who trusts in the LORD of hosts, the God of Jacob.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXV. V. 1—3. This psalm seems to have been written, either during the Babylonish captivity, or before the people were re-established in their own land.—‘It might be much better used by them,’ (the Jews,) ‘after their return from the captivity of Babylon, than at any other time; when they were infested with many enemies, who disturbed the peaceable enjoyment of their country and religion.’ Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Ezra iv—vi.)—The Lord had formerly been favourable unto their fathers, and had often brought back their captivity, having pardoned those sins for which they had been sold into the hands of their enemies; and this gave the captive Jews encouragement again to expect deliverance. (Marg. Ref.) Or, ‘We have received the beginnings of deliverance, as a token of thy forgiveness and reconciliation: therefore “perfect what concerneth us.”’ (Note, cxxxviii. 8.)

Covered, &c. (2) Note, xxxii. 1, 2.

V. 4. ‘Our sins indeed deserve worse than all our sufferings, and retard our re-establishment: but turn and convert us to thyself by thy special grace, and make way for the more complete effects of thy reconciliation to us. (Notes, lxxx. 3. 19. Jer. xxxi. 18—20. Dan. ix. 14—19.)

V. 5—7. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lxxiv. 1, 2. lxxvii. 5—12.) ‘He confesseth that our salvation cometh only of God’s mercy.’ (Notes, Ezra iii. 8—13. Jer. xxxiii. 10, 11.) ‘Though we deserve to be more miserable than we are, yet let thy mercy prevail with thee to grant us a complete deliverance.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 8. The prophet, having prayed for mercy and salvation, waited to hear what message “God the LORD” would send by him; being assured that he had thoughts of peace towards the nation of Israel, whom he had taken for his people and specially favoured, and that a Peacemaker would at length be sent to them. But as folly, or idolatry and wickedness, had brought on them their former miseries, he warned them to beware, when again favoured and prospered, not to return to the same foolish and rebellious conduct.—After the captivity, the nation was preserved from gross idolatry till the Redeemer came; and he both went himself and sent his apostles and ministers, to speak peace to Israel first, and to “bless them by turning every one of them from his iniquities.” (Notes, Acts iii. 22—26.) But the nation rejected him and his message, and, returning to rebellion and folly, was deprived of its peculiar privileges; and then peace was spoken in Christ’s name to the Gentiles, who became the people and “saints” of God by faith in Christ Jesus, and returned no more to their dumb idols and evil courses. V. 9. The temple and ordinances of God had been “the glory” of Israel: and that glory in some measure dwelt among them again after the captivity. But the Redeemer, who appeared in that land, was its chief Glory; his coming approached, and his salvation was, at all times, nigh those who feared the Lord. (Notes, Luke i. 46—55, v. 50.
ii. 25—32.) Christ himself, “the Salvation of God,” and “the glory of his people Israel,” was evidently predicted; and the expectation of this great Deliverer was intended to be the support of true believers under their trials, through successive ages; even as the expectation of his coming to make his cause triumphant, and at length to raise the dead, and judge the world, is, under the new testament-dispensation. (Notes, 1 Cor. iv. 3—5. Tit. ii. 11—14. Heb.
ix. 27, 28.)

V. 10—13. When God restored the captive Jews, he mercifully fulfilled his faithful promises to them. He had glorified his justice in their sufferings, and he might consistently return unto them in peace. Thus while truth was performed on earth, righteousness looked down from heaven with approbation. The Lord conferred manifold benefits on his people: their land again gave its increase, both of the fruits of the earth, and of the fruits of righteousness:
for the justice and holiness of God, which had been so conspicuous in those dispensations, had a powerful effect to attach the people to his ordinances and commandments, and to teach them to copy the example of his equity, truth, and mercy.—Thus this passage may be explained; but the interpretation is comparatively uninteresting, and falls greatly below the energy of the expressions made use of.
It is therefore generally, and no doubt justly, interpreted in a far higher and fuller sense, of the harmony of the divine attributes in the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ. The truth of the promises is manifested by the mercy of God in sending the Redeemer; and the truth of the types and prophecies, in his person, miracles, obedience, and atonement: (Notes, John i. 17. xiv. 4—6:) but especially the truth of the threatenings now consists with the exercise of mercy to believers, through the great Surety, “who bare our sins in his own body on the tree.” (Notes,
Is. liii. 4—12. Dan. ix. 24. 1 Pet. ii. 18—25. 1 John ii. 1, 2.) The justice of God, which renders to all their due, demanded the punishment of the transgressor, and seemed to preclude all hope of his obtaining favour: but it is now satisfied by the great atonement, and amicably embraces and unites with peace; and entirely approves of the believing sinner’s being treated as a righteous person by a reconciled Judge. (Notes, Is. ix. 6, 7. xlv. 23—25. 2 Cor. v. 18 —21. Eph. ii. 11—18. Heb. vii. 1—3.) Thus Christ, “the “TRUTH and the LIFE,” sprang out of the earth, when he was born of a woman: and “justice” looked down upon his character, obedience, and atonement, well pleased and satisfied. (Notes, Matt. iii. 16, 17. xvii. 5—8. John xiv. 4—6.) For his sake the Father gives all good things, especially his Holy Spirit, to those who ask him; (Notes, Matt.

vii. 7—11. Luke xi. 5—13;) and by his influence every land, where the gospel is preached, produces an increase of believers, and of holiness to the glory of God. “Righteousness,” as a harbinger, marched before, and marked out the Redeemer’s path, which he pursued without deviation through his whole course: his righteousness went before to prepare his mediatorial throne; and when it is discovered to the believer for his justification, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, it becomes also his example, and he learns to walk in the steps of Christ, as well as to rely on his merits. This harmony of the divine attributes in man’s salvation is the grand peculiarity of the Christian religion, by which it displays the glory of God in full perfection. No other religion, no other view of Christianity, than that for substance here stated, makes any provision for the honour of the divine justice in the exercise of mercy: and this accords to the language of the prophets and apostles in many places. (Notes, Is. xlv. 20—22. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. Rom. iii. 21—26.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The mercies shewn to Israel, in their deliverance from bondage and captivity, were external signs of that redemption afforded, in all ages, to the remnant of believers, in setting them free from the bondage of sin and Satan, which always accompanies the “covering of their sins,” and the turning away of the fierce wrath of God from them.—The awakened sinner, when distressed in conscience, should attend to this report, and cry earnestly to “the God of salvation,” to convert him by his grace, and mercifully to cause his anger to cease from him: nor will that anger endure for ever against any, but the impenitent and unbelieving.—Even the true people of God, when they commit sin, may expect sharp and tedious afflictions:
but when they return to him, humbly praying, that he would “shew them his mercy, and grant them his salvation;” he will in due time revive their comforts, and make them again to rejoice in him. (Note, li. 12, 13.)— Having spoken unto the Lord in prayer, we should compose ourselves to hear him speak to us by his word; and to expect an answer by his Spirit, or in his providence.
He will certainly “speak peace to his people,” whom he has separated and sanctified to himself. Yet let them take warning that they do not turn again to folly, forgetful of his rebukes and corrections, and abusing his mercy: for this conduct so much resembles that of hypocrites, that it must bring them into uncertainty and distress; and the Lord will greatly resent it, if their falls do not teach them watchfulness, and their recoveries gratitude.—The preaching of the gospel, and the lively ordinances of God, confer more honour on any land, city, or village, than all external distinctions can do: and “his salvation is nigh those, who “fear” his wrath, reverence his authority, and humbly seek his mercy. For in the Redeemer’s person and work, all things are ready for the reception of every one, whose heart is prepared to accept of mercy: all the Persons and perfections in the Godhead will be eternally glorified in the salvation of sinners: and the redemption of their souls, when they repent and believe the gospel, is a continuation of the display, which was made of the divine truth, justice, and mercy, when the Redeemer paid the all-sufficient ransom. Through him the sinner asks and receives “all “things pertaining to life and godliness,” and thus becomes fruitful in every good work: and, by looking unto the Saviour’s righteousness, he finds his feet “set in the “way of his steps.” (Note, 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18.)—May this salvation be communicated to our hearts, and appear in our lives; that as the divine attributes harmonize in our redemption, so all Christian graces may harmonize in our characters. (Note, 2 Pet. i. 5—7.) May this glory dwell in our land, and yield a large increase of truth and goodness, of purity and equity, through successive generations. May the Lord revive his church throughout all the earth, that his people may rejoice in him: may he grant, that ‘all who are called Christians may be led into the way of ‘truth, and hold the faith in unity of spirit, in the bond ‘of peace, and in righteousness of life:’ and may he put an end to all remains of idolatry and vice, and fill the world with truth and righteousness.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXVI. Title. It is not certain, whether David offered this prayer when persecuted by Saul, or when driven out of the land by Absalom; though the latter seems most probable.

V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 16, 17. xxxiv. 1—6. Matt. v. 3.)—‘All prayer is founded on a sense of our own wants, ‘and God’s ability to supply them. In the sight of his ‘Maker, every sinner is “poor and needy,” and he must ‘become so in his own, that his petitions may be regarded; ‘he must pray with the humility and importunity of a ‘starving beggar, at the gate of heaven, if he expect the ‘great King to “bow down his ear, and hear him.”’ Bp. Horne.

Holy. (2) ‘One whom thou favourest, (marg.) hast set apart for thyself, and made partaker of sanctifying grace:’ one who has found favour and learned mercy. It is the same word as in the sixteenth Psalm is translated “holy “One,” and it is generally rendered “a saint.” When St. Paul spoke of himself, as “less than the least of all “saints;” he, as David does here, united the deepest poverty of spirit, with the fullest confidence that he was in a state of grace, and an accepted servant of God. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Eph. iii. 8.)

V. 3—5. David prayed not only every day, but all the day, that is, frequently, constantly, and importunately: (Notes, xxv. 4, 5. Luke xviii. 1—8:) and he not only lifted up his voice, but his soul, his most earnest desires, unto God: (Notes, xxv. 1. 1 Sam. i. 12—16, v. 15:) and therefore he expected that he should, and prayed that he might, be made joyful by an answer to his supplications; because, though conscious of sin in many instances, yet he firmly believed that God was abundantly kind, propitious, and compassionate to all who thus called on him. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 14, 15.) Thou ‘art no less bountiful...than I am indigent; ready also to pardon those ‘that have offended thee; yea to shew abundant kindness ‘to every one of them in their greatest distress, when with ‘unfeigned devotion they call upon thee.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 6—8. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1. 7—15. xci. 14—16. cxxx. 1—4.) The Gentiles indeed might call on their gods, and yet perish in their perils and miseries; as the objects of their idolatry had no power to save them: but the God, whom David worshipped, was not like them, but infinitely powerful as well as merciful; and his former works for his people encouraged the expectation of effectual aid to all his upright worshippers. V. 9, 10. Probably David hoped, that God's interposition in his behalf, and the celebration of his glory and wonderful works by him and his subjects, would bring many of the neighbouring nations to renounce idolatry and worship the Creator: but "the Spirit of God which spake by him, and whose words were on his tongue," evidently predicted the calling of the gentiles by the gospel, and the universal prevalence of Christianity. The original is expressly a prediction; and is generally so translated.—'This proveth that David prayed in the name of... the Messias, of whose kingdom he doth here prophesy.' (Notes, xxii. 27—31. ^{lxvii}. ^{lxxii}. 8—11. 17—19. ^{Is}. ii. 2—5. ^{xi}. 6—9. ^{xliii}. 8—13. ^{Jer}. x. 6—11. ^{Zech}. viii. 20—23. ^{xiv}. 6—9. ^{Rev}. xi. 15—18. ^{xx}. 1—6.)—Alone. V. 11. Unite, &c.] Naturally all the powers of our mind are "out of course." The judgment is darkened, the will perverted, and the affections, instead of cheerfully following the directions of the higher powers of the soul, tumultuate and rebel against them. The effect of grace is, to correct this disorder; and to subject the passions to the dominion of right reason, by subjecting the whole soul to the authority of God. But its operations are never in this world carried to perfection. Still the mind which loves God, and "delights in his law after the inner man," "finds another law" within "warring against the law" which it would fain obey. "It cannot therefore do the things which it would:" still the affections are apt to wander after forbidden objects; and too often the consent of the will is, for the time, drawn over to that which it habitually rejects. (Notes, ^{Rom}. vii. 15—25. ^{Gal}. v. 16—18.) The harmony of holiness is broken, or not yet perfectly restored: "the flesh lusteth against the spirit," and is contrary to it. Thus the heart is divided and an inward strife maintained, to the deep affliction of the believer who cries out, "Oh wretched man that I am!" and at all times prays, "Unite my heart," so liable to distraction, so prone to division between God and the world, "to fear thy name." (Notes, ^{Matt}. vi. 24. ^{2 Cor}. xi. 1—6, v. 3.)

V. 12, 13. (Marg. Ref.) Many confine the meaning of these words to the imminent danger of death, from which God had delivered his servant. But probably David referred to the guilt of murder and adultery, which he had contracted, and which merited the severest vengeance, temporal and eternal: yet the Lord, of his great mercy, had pardoned these, as well as all his other sins, and had thus "delivered his soul from the lowest hell."—It is the same word as is used concerning Christ, and translated hell. (Note, xvi. 8—11.) It means the invisible state, whether of the body in the grave, or of the soul in the world of spirits: but the word "lowest" greatly favours the latter interpretation. Some think that David here also spake as the type of Christ.

I will glorify thy name for evermore (12). Notes, ^{cxlv}. 1, 2. ^{cxlvi}. 2.—'I do now most thankfully acknowledge thee; and will never cease to honour thee, and to do thee service, so long as I have any being.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 14, 15. Many a time God had rescued his servant from the most extreme danger; but again he stood in urgent need of the same powerful aid. Absalom, Ahithophel, and the other conspirators, being proud, violent, cruel, and impious men, sought to murder him; and perhaps were encouraged to hope for success by an idea, that David's crimes had provoked God to forsake him. (Notes, iii. 1, 2. ^{lxxi}. 10, 11.) And indeed, David seems here to allow, that this would have been the case, had the Lord dealt with him in strict justice: but the abundant compassion, long-suffering, and mercy of God to the most guilty and miserable, and his faithfulness to his promises, gave the humble penitent a firm ground of confidence, that he was pardoned, and should be delivered from such haughty and impious assailants. (Marg. Ref.—5. Notes, ^{Ex}. xxxiv. 5—7. ^{Lam}. iii. 21—23. ^{Mic}. vii. 18—20. ^{John} i. 17.)

V. 16. 'As thou O Lord, art a God full of compassion, mercy, and truth, for thy name's sake both pardon my sins, and by thy strength uphold me in thy ways, and defend and save me from my powerful assailants.' (Notes, ^{cxliii}. 10—12.)—The son of thine handmaid.] David seems here to plead, that his pious mother had brought him up in the fear of God, and offered many prayers for him; and therefore he was devoted to him from his birth, and entrusted to his keeping, having been brought up as a servant in his family; as the children of the female slaves were brought up in their master's family, were considered as his property, and were entitled to his protection. (Notes, li. 5, 6. ^{cxvi}. 16. ^{2 Tim}. i. 3—5.)—The Lord Jesus was the Son of her, who said, " Behold the handmaid of the " Lord, be it unto me according to thy word." (Luke i.

38.)

V. 17. Perhaps David hoped, that, if God would shew some evident token of favour, and so evidently interpose that all might see his determination to help and comfort his servant, even his virulent enemies might be put to shame, and brought to repentance, and so share the plenteous mercy of God.—The resurrection of Christ and the descent of the Holy Spirit were " tokens for good " to the church ; which put all those, who had crucified the Lord of glory, to shame and confusion, and many of them were likewise brought to repent and believe the gospel.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

The condescension of our God, in bowing down his ear to receive the prayers of us miserable sinners, is very wonderful : yet our very poverty and wretchedness, when felt and acknowledged, form a powerful plea at the throne of grace : and the greatest, and most powerful and prosperous, among the rulers of the world, must thus feel, acknowledge, and plead them in penitent faith, or their prayers will in no way resemble those of king David, or be accepted and answered, as his were.—It is a great encouragement in prayer, to be conscious that we have experienced the converting grace of God, and have learned to trust in him and to be his servants : for, once we served other masters, and leaned on other dependences ; but he has mercifully effected the important change.—If we " cry " unto the Lord daily," and lift up our souls unto him, we may hope that he will both preserve and " rejoice our " souls." Yet our defective holiness, our scanty services, and our imperfect prayers, would be no ground of confidence, if we had not a God of infinite mercy to approach unto. His " readiness to forgive," through that great atonement which he has provided, and his " plentiful
" mercy to all that call upon him," is the original source of our encouragement : and our own consciousness of integrity and most devoted obedience, is merely evidential of the reality of our faith, and of the grace of God bestowed upon us.—The abundance of his mercy, to pardon the sins and to supply the wants of those who call upon him, how many soever they may be, is sufficient to encourage all, who come with the desire of their hearts to pray before him : yet even this plentiful mercy will not profit those who remain too careless, proud, carnal, and unbelieving, to call on him for grace and salvation.—The vanities of the heathen could not assist their deluded votaries ; angels and saints cannot relieve those who worship them : our God alone possesses omnipresence and omniscience, almighty power, and infinite love ; without which none can know all our necessities, or help us in them, and bear with all our provocations. None of the works ascribed to idols, are at all like the works of JEHOVAH, among which that of redemption stands pre-eminent. Nor can those worldly objects, which men idolize, give them any assistance in the hour of distress, at the approach of death, or at the day of judgment. " All nations " therefore, " whom " God hath made," are bound, in interest as well as in duty, to come and worship before him, and to glorify his name ; seeing " he is great, and doeth wondrous things,

" and is God alone : " and the time approaches, when they shall understand their interest, and in this respect do their duty ; and for this we should pray without ceasing, and use whatever means we can.—The soul that is born of God is often more desirous to be taught the way and truth of God, in order to walk in them, than to be delivered out of severe distress.

V. 11—17.

The most upright believers find it difficult to attain to that simplicity and " singleness of heart," which they long for ; and they still find cause to pray, " Unite my " heart to fear thy name," O LORD. Nay, the most eminent Christian will most readily confess, that he has deserved " the lowest hell," and expects deliverance from it only by the rich mercy of God : and being thus humbled, and taught to trust in him for salvation, and prepared to " praise him for it with his whole heart, and to glorify his " name for evermore," he possesses an evidence, that he is indeed " delivered from the wrath to come." (Note, 1 Thes. i. 9, 10.) But men of this character will often have reason to complain, that the proud, the violent, and those who " set not God before them," have arisen against them to conspire their hurt ; and especially that the powers of darkness seek after their souls. Still however, the compassion, long-suffering, and plentiful mercy and truth of God, will be their refuge and consolation : to him they will look for help and strength, as well as for pardon ; and they will wait on him to give them, from time to time, some token for good, in their own experience and from his comforting Spirit, and in the sight of others from his providential interpositions ; that those who hate them may see and be ashamed, and either converted or intimidated.—
It is an encouragement to us, when we pray, to recollect, that others have prayed, or are praying for us : and they,
whose parents were the servants of the Lord, and who brought them up for him, may urge that as a plea why he should hear and help them.—But in considering David's experience, and that of the believer as corresponding with it ; we must not lose sight of him, " who, though he was " rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his " poverty might be rich." (Note, 2 Cor. viii. 6—9.) He most perfectly served and continually called upon his heavenly Father ; and through him the plentiful mercy of our God is exercised towards the chief of sinners. Being raised from the dead, he is made triumphant over the assemblies of proud and violent men, who sought after his soul ; and " all nations shall come and worship before him," and glorify the name of the Lord ; but all who hate him shall be ashamed and perish for ever. May we rely wholly on his righteousness, propitiation, and intercession, and copy his example ; and may we learn from him to bear poverty, hardship, or persecution, with cheerfulness and resignation ; and to hope and wait for a happy issue out of all our tribulations.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXVII. V. 1. Some think that this Psalm was composed to be sung, when the foundation of the temple on mount Moriah was laid; or when David fixed on the spot where the temple was to be erected. (Notes, Gen. xxii. 2. 1 Chr. xxi. 26—30. xxii. 1. 2 Chr. iii. 1, 2.) Mount Moriah seems to have been a part of mount Zion. —“It is his” (that is, God’s) “foundation in the mountains of holiness.” Or, “Its foundation,” that is, the temple’s. The abruptness of the beginning shews how full the Psalmist’s mind was of joy and admiration. The tabernacle placed, and the temple afterwards built, by express divine direction, on these holy mountains, were typical of Christ as the Foundation, and of his church, as built on this Foundation, for “an habitation of God through the Spirit.” (Notes, Is. xxviii. 16. 1 Cor. iii. 10—15. Eph. ii. 19—22.)

V. 2. Because of the temple and its typical ordinances, the Lord delighted in Zion more than in all the dwellings of Jacob, and in all the secret and social worship performed by that people, who were selected from the nations of the earth, to be near unto him as his worshippers. (Marg. Ref.—Note, lxxviii. 67—69.)

V. 3. ‘Pleasant for situation, and magnificent in its buildings, Jerusalem was...the joy of the whole earth. ‘There was the royal residence of the kings of Judah; ‘there was the temple and the ark, and the glory, and the ‘King of heaven dwelling in the midst of her; her streets ‘were honoured with the footsteps of the Redeemer of ‘men; there he preached,...and died, and rose again; ‘thither he sent down the Spirit, and there he first laid ‘the foundations of his church.’ Bp. Horne.—The glorious things spoken by the Spirit of prophecy concerning Zion, certainly related to future ages, to the coming of Christ, the gospel sent forth from Jerusalem to all the nations, the establishment of the church, and to that church itself, both as militant on earth, and triumphant in heaven. “For even that which was made glorious,” (in Zion the type and feeble shadow,) “had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth.”—‘Though ‘thy glorious estate do not yet appear, yet wait with patience, and God will accomplish his promise.’ (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. This is generally understood as a prediction of the calling of men, from all these nations into the church by the gospel: but it seems rather to be a comparison between the most eminent characters, which other nations had produced, and in whom they gloried; and the worthies of Zion, or the church.—“I am wont to make honourable mention among my acquaintance...of Egypt and ‘Babylon;...bidding them observe that such a notable ‘person was born there.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 5. ‘But what is this to Zion? of whom it shall be ‘said in future times, that...“this and that man,” a great ‘many worthies and far more eminent...were born in her: ‘for she hath no meaner instructor than the Most High, ‘who shall settle her in a flourishing estate, by educating ‘and forming her inhabitants to the most excellent qualities.’ Bp. Patrick.—The word rendered “Man” is generally used for a person of eminence; and the clause “this and that man,” is simply, “a Man and a Man,” which some think is used as a peculiar superlative, and means, the most eminent of men, even the Lord Jesus Christ, and they suppose, that He, in his divine nature, is “the ‘Highest” who “shall establish the church.” No doubt, He is the glory of the church, and of his people Israel: (Notes, Luke ii. 25—32. Rom. ix. 4, 5:) but his crucifixion was the deepest disgrace imaginable to Jerusalem itself.—It should here especially be remembered, that almost all the sacred writers belonged to Zion, or to that despised nation, which met to worship at Zion: and no nation on earth, or part of a nation, has been preserved or delivered from idolatry, except through the revelation which God made by the prophets and apostles of Israel. (Notes, Gen. xii. 1—3. Zech. viii. 20—23. Preface to Luke.)

V. 6. [Writeth up the people.] ‘When he calleth by his ‘word them into his church, whom he had elected and ‘written in his book.’—Rather, the Lord will number up, at the last day, all the true children of the church; shew the eminence and excellence of their characters; and contrast them as “one in Christ Jesus,” with all that which the world has admired and celebrated in ungodly men. ‘In ‘the book of life, that register of heaven, kept by God ‘himself, our names are entered, not as born of flesh and ‘blood by the will of man; but as born of water and the ‘Spirit by the will of God: of each person it is written ‘“that he was born there,” in the church and city of ‘God.’ Bp. Horne.

V. 7. ‘The literal version...seems to be, “They shall “sing, as those that lead up the dance,” that is, most joyfully: ...and the burden of the song...was to be this, “All my springs...are in thee.” Bp. Horne. “The prophet setteth his whole affections and comfort in the church.”—The Psalmist himself evidently decides for the church, and against the world; because all the springs of life and salvation are in the church, and none elsewhere. For “the LORD dwelleth in Zion,” as “God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself;” and “from his fulness” all believers in every age, have received;” as “drawing water with joy from the wells of salvation.”—Perhaps the singing and musick at the sanctuary were mentioned, as external expressions of that joy and praise, which would most abound in the church after the coming of the Messiah. To close the contrast; “All the fountains of life, “the wells of salvation,” whence I “draw water with joy,” day by day, are in Zion, and none elsewhere.” (Notes, Is. xii. 3—6.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is not merely our duty; but our privilege, interest, and whole salvation, to build all our hopes on that foundation, on which God has built his church, and his whole plan of manifesting the glory of all his perfections in complete harmony: and “other foundation can no man lay, than that “is laid, which is Jesus Christ.” Those who build on this holy Foundation, thence derive sanctifying grace, and become a holy temple and priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through him. (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 4—6.)—Publick worship, properly conducted, is most honourable, and therefore most acceptable, to the Lord; and ought not by any means to be neglected by those, who would be accounted denizens of the city of our God. When we duly consider the glorious things, which are spoken of her pleasant situation, her holy temple, her royal palaces, her fortifications; her righteous King, and his wise, just, and merciful government; the character of her inhabitants; and all their privileges, immunities, and durable advantages; we can do no other than desire to be enrolled among her citizens.—After all the encomiums, which have been lavished on the heroes, statesmen, orators, poets, and philosophers, of whom Egypt, China, Greece, and Rome, and all other nations have boasted; impartiality must allow, that the despised church of God has produced an illustrious and numerous catalogue of worthies, who have done immensely more to render mankind wise, holy, and happy, than all who have appeared on earth besides. Though Emmanuel, the divine Saviour, born of Israel’s race, as Zion’s most glorious Son, her honour and felicity, infinitely outshines all the rest; yet his followers are justly deserving of esteem, applause, and gratitude, above all other men. But no one expects that they will receive due honour, who reflects how the Son of God himself, and his prophets and apostles were treated, as they severally appeared on earth, and performed their respective services to mankind. But in the records of heaven the meanest of those who are “born again” stands registered: “the Lord himself, when he writeth up the “people,” will allow them all the privileges of citizens of Zion, and honour them before the assembled world; and this honour and happiness alone are worthy of the ardent desires of all men, in every age and every clime. For “the Highest himself shall establish Zion:” a vast and eternal revenue of praise will redound to him, from his church of redeemed sinners, and their joy to eternity shall equal their largest capacities. All the springs of life and consolation are in the church alone: and those who draw not from these wells of salvation, will most certainly be forever put off with broken cisterns which can hold no water.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXVIII. Title. Heman the Ezrahite, so distinguished, according to the general opinion of learned men, as a descendant of Zerah, the son of Judah, was a different person from Heman the chief singer, in the days of David, who was a Levite. (Notes, 1 Kings iv. 30—34. 1 Chr. ii. 5, 6. xxv. 1—6.) But it is not at all certain, at what time, or on what occasion, the psalm was composed.—Some think the word Leannoth signifies, “for dejection,” as almost the whole psalm is the emphatic language of the deepest despondency: but others suppose the word to mean no more, than that the psalm was to be sung responsively, and that it is merely a musical term.

V. 1, 2. Probably the Psalmist wrote this psalm under heavy afflictions and great distress of soul, and meant to describe his own case: yet the language unavoidably leads the thoughts of the attentive reader to the Redeemer, who was doubtless intended by the Holy Spirit; and the history of his closing scene forms the best comment upon it.—It is called by many ‘a penitential psalm:’ but there is not one confession of sin, or prayer for pardon, contained in it; nor one comfortable word, except the address, “O “LORD God of my salvation,” which may be applied to Christ with reference to his deliverance from his sufferings and enemies. (Marg. Ref.)—‘The lxxxviii Psalm agree; ‘in all things with the xxii and the lxix Psalms, which is ‘an argument, that it ought to be explained by us in the ‘same manner. It contains therefore equally a prayer of ‘Christ to the Father, poured out from the cross.’ Vitringa in Bp. Horne. It is with this view of it, that it is appointed by our church, as one of the proper Psalms on Good Friday.

—39.) “Full” indeed “of troubles,” was thy soul, ‘blessed Jesus, in that dreadful hour, when, under the ‘united weight of our sins and sorrows, thou wert sinking ‘into the grave. ... Let us judge of thy love by thy suffer- ‘ings, and of both by the impossibility of our fully com- ‘prehending them.’ Bp. Horne. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Eph. iii. 14—19.)
V. 4. Christ ‘died to all appearance, like the rest of ‘mankind; nay, he was forcibly put to death as a male- ‘factor, and seemed in the hands of his executioners “as ‘“a man that had no strength.” ... The people shook ‘their heads at him, saying, “He saved others, himself ‘“he cannot save.”’ Bp. Horne. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 39—44. 2 Cor. xiii. 1—4.)
V. 5. A dead man has done with, and is free from, the concerns of this world. (Note, Job iii. 11—19.) So long as he lived, he was the object of God’s providential care: but when he is laid in the grave, he seems forgotten and cut off from his hand; that is, until the resurrection. (Notes, Job xiv. 7—15.) Thus the Psalmist thought, that he had done with life, and all its interests, employments, comforts, and cares; (Notes, Is. xxxviii. 9—13. 17—20;) and should be no more regarded by Providence, than the dead corpses of men slain in battle, and thrown into one common grave, appear to be. Thus Christ, when expiring on the cross, seemed to be deserted and forgotten by God; and when he was laid in the sepulchre, the Jewish rulers concluded that by sealing and guarding his body, they should cause his name and doctrine to be speedily forgotten. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 62—66.)
V. 6—9. (Marg. Ref.) Many of the emphatical expressions, here employed, are nearly similar to those, which more evidently relate to the sufferings of Christ, (especially in the Psalms above referred to,) at the awful season in which his enemies, urged on by the powers of darkness, nailed him to the cross, insulted him when expiring, and rejoiced when they had shut his body up in the dark and gloomy sepulchre: but, in accession to all that they could do, “it pleased the Lord to bruise him,” and “to make his soul an offering for sin:” yea, he “was ‘made a curse for us.” (Notes, Is. liii. 9, 10. Gal. iii. 10—14.) Thus he was laid, by the Lord himself, “in the ‘lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps:” because “the ‘wrath of God lay hard on him, and he was afflicted with “all his waves.”—In the mean while, his disciples forsook him, Judas betrayed him, Peter denied him, all were afraid or ashamed to own him; and he was left bound and in confinement without redress; though he just before “had ‘offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying “and tears, unto him that was able to save him from “death; and was heard, in that he feared.” (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 18. xxxi. 10—13. Job xix. 5—22. John xvi. 31—33.)

V. 10—12. It was not to be expected, that the dead should arise from the grave, or the soul return from the place of departed spirits, to praise God in his congregations on earth, and celebrate among them his power, truth, and mercy: and therefore the Psalmist may seem to plead for present deliverance, as Hezekiah and others did. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, vi. 5. xxx. 9, 10. Is. xxxviii. 17—20.) But, considering the psalm as the language of our suffering Redeemer, these verses may be explained as his earnest prayer to be carried through his arduous work; that “his soul “might not be left in hell, nor his flesh see corruption:” but that he might make known to men the way of salvation, to the praise of the Lord’s power, mercy, and truth; and, as the first-fruits of the resurrection, not only preserve their souls from destruction, but also raise their bodies from the grave, that land of darkness and forgetfulness. (Notes, xxii. 22—31. lxix. 29—36.)—The word rendered “de- ‘struction” is Abaddon, which St. John gives as a name of the devil, that great destroyer, or of one of his principal ministers in the work of destruction. It seems therefore to denote the pit of destruction, as the other words do the grave. (Note, Rev. ix. 11.)—Without the mercy of God in Christ, the bodies of all sinners must have finally been left in the grave, and their souls in hell: for “he “is the Resurrection and the Life.” (Note, John xi. 20—27.)
V. 13. ‘Thus I cry in the anguish of my soul, which ‘keeps me awake, to present my prayers unto thee before ‘the morning light.’ Bp. Patrick. Prevent thee.] ‘Come more early before thee, than is usual with men.’ (Mark i. 35.)

V. 15. By a trivial change in the pointing, this verse may be rendered, "I am afflicted and expiring: from my youth I suffer thy terrors; I am distracted."—"I am now in the greatest anguish, and about to expire." From my youth, I looked forward to this dreadful season; knowing what I had to endure from thy wrath against the sins of men. Thus I have been "a man of sorrows" all my life. And I am now so distressed, that I am at a loss what to do.—The original words in the Gospel of St. Mark, respecting our Lord's agony in the garden, (ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι, καὶ ἀδημονεῖν), seem exactly to convey the meaning of the word (דַּחְסָה) here rendered distracted. (Note, Mark xiv. 32—36.) He was filled with amazement, horror, anguish, and dejection, beyond all utterance and conception.

(Note, Rom. viii. 28—32.)—The terrors that pursued, and environed, and overwhelmed the suffering Redeemer, in that "hour and power of darkness," cannot be known, even by those who know most of "the terrors of the Lord."—The original is peculiarly emphatical.

V. 18. 'It is mentioned again, as a most affecting instance of Christ's passion, that he was entirely forsaken, and left all alone, in that dreadful day. ... His "lovers" and "friends," his disciples and acquaintance "were put far from him;" they all "forsook him and fled," to hide themselves from the fury of the Jews, "in darkness," "in dark, that is, in secret places." Bp. Horne.—But the darkness and distress of the minds of our Lord's disciples, at this doleful crisis, seem likewise to have been predicted. (Note, 6—9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The sacred Scriptures, if carefully investigated, will continually remind us of the apostle's words; "Let us lay aside every weight, ... and let us run with patience the race that is set before us; looking unto Jesus, ... who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame." Heb. xii. 1, 2. When his life drew nigh unto the grave, his soul was full of trouble; and his gloom was as deep, as could possibly consist with the perfect exercise of faith, and hope, and love. The enmity and insult of those, who "counted him with them" "that go down into the pit" of destruction, and despised him as one deprived of strength and help; his confinement, bonds, and stripes, and dying pains; the treachery, cowardice, and neglect of his disciples, professed friends, and acquaintance; who either stood aloof from his sufferings, or turned away from him as an abomination, while his enemies compassed him about like floods of water, and all the hosts of hell assaulted his soul;—all these things formed a vast aggregate of sufferings beyond what human language can express. But the wrath of God infused the greatest bitterness into his cup: this lay hard upon him, and weighed him down into "the lowest pit, in darkness, "in the deeps." The very prospect of this indignation afflicted him, and made him "ready to die," from his youth up: and when he actually suffered these terrors, he was as one distracted. Still, however, the Redeemer cried day and night unto his heavenly Father, and stretched out his hands unto him, as in the utmost extremity of distress "in his agony he prayed more earnestly," and his prayer was indeed heard and accepted; (Note, Heb. v. 7—10;) though he seemed to be cast off, and no more remembered, than a dead man who is laid in the grave. But there was no reason for the Saviour's unequalled sorrows, in any part of his own conduct: perfectly free from sin himself, and infinitely dear to his heavenly Father, "he was wounded for our transgressions," and bare the heavy wrath of God due to our sins. While therefore we hear him plead to be delivered and exalted, that he might shew forth the loving-kindness, righteousness, faithfulness, and wonderful works of God, in the salvation of his people; let us consider what our case would have been, if we had been left to bear this wrath of God for ourselves; and what they will endure who "neglect so great salvation;" that we may know the value of his love, and feel the immensity of our obligations.—And should any of us, wretched sinners, be left to experience anguish of spirit, terrors of conscience, and horrible temptations; should we suffer tribulation from the world, in such various forms, and with so many embittering circumstances, as to be constrained to appropriate some of the expressions of this most doleful psalm; still let us remember, that we are not in "the depths of hell," and may therefore yet hope in the Lord God of salvation. Let us persevere in earnest prayer, and plead the glory which will arise to him from saving us rather than from destroying us; while we desire to be monuments of his mercy, that we may be employed in celebrating his praises. Let us remember, that every affliction comes from his hand, from whom alone we expect relief; and that all creatures are his instruments. Let us also recollect the

PSALM LXXXIX.

The Psalmist praises God for his covenanted mercies to David: celebrating his greatness, excelsiency, and wonderful works; and shewing the felicity of his people, 1—18. He enlarges on the promises of the covenant made with David and his Seed, 19—37. He complains of the afflicted state of David's kingdom, with earnest prayers and expostulations, 38—51.

He concludes with blessing the Lord, 52.

glory that followed our Redeemer's extreme suffering. Let us not then yield to impatience, or to despair; but still expect a day of comfort, after the darkest and most tedious nights of temptation. And even if we should be forced to conclude one prayer after another, without a glimpse of encouragement; let us begin again and again, and still hope against hope, and we shall at length prevail. But, if we are exempted from such dreadful trials, let us bless the Lord for it, and sympathize with, and pray for, our afflicted and tempted brethren.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXIX. Title. Many learned men are of opinion, that this psalm was written during the Babylonish captivity, when, the family of David being entirely dethroned, the promises of God seemed to be made void: but if it were composed at so late a period; no account can possibly be given why it was ascribed to Ethan the Ezrahite. (Marg. Ref. a.) Indeed, it seems to contain internal evidence, that it belongs to earlier times: for none of the deliverances vouchsafed to the kings or people of Judah, after the days of David, are mentioned in it: and the Psalmist, in complaining of the degraded and deplorable condition of David's family, is silent as to any desolations of Jerusalem and the temple, and the captivity and dispersion of the people; which the psalms evidently relating to Nebuchadnezzar's devastations particularly insist upon. It seems therefore to have been written on occasion of some events, in which the honour and power of the kings of David's race were fallen, and apparently ruined; but, without either the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, or the captivity of the people: and what period so exactly suits this view of the subject, as the reign of Rehoboam? Ten of the tribes of Israel had revolted from him; Jeroboam, the king placed over them, was his powerful adversary; and Shishak, king of Egypt, so entirely reduced and impoverished him, that he only seems to have retained the kingdom, by the clemency, and perhaps contempt, of his haughty conqueror. (Notes, 1 Kings xii. 16—24. xiv. 22—30. 2 Chr. xii. 1—11.)—It is probable, that "Ethan the Ezrahite" lived in the reign of Solomon: and if he survived him, and witnessed these events, after having seen the glory and power of Solomon's kingdom; it would be very natural for him to lament the change, in the language made use of towards the close of the psalm.—As the preceding psalm, ascribed to Heman, seems to have been occasioned by his private trials and distresses, and yet was an evident prophecy of the sufferings of Christ; perhaps this psalm, occasioned by the calamities which had befallen David's race, may likewise be considered as a prophecy of the afflictions and persecutions, to which the Christian church has been exposed; and especially of the triumphs of the Roman Antichrist.

V. 1—4. The Psalmist, being about to deplore the apparent failure of the covenant made with David, begins with declaring his determined purpose of praising for ever the mercies and faithfulness of God, which he desired to make known to all future generations. (Notes, cxlv. 1, 2. cxlvi. 2.) Indeed he was assured that his words, being dictated by the Holy Spirit, would continue through all generations, as a testimony to this effect. For he had said, and he would not retract it, however appearances might then be; that the mercy, of which the foundation had been laid in the covenant with David, would be "built up for ever;" and that the faithfulness of God to his promises would be "established in the heavens;" or like them, that is, above the reach of the changes which take place in this lower world. These emphatical expressions are literally verified in the kingdom of Christ, the promised Seed of David, whose throne is established in heaven, and whose true subjects will all be exalted thither.—The Psalmist then introduces JEHOVAH himself declaring the purport of this covenant made with his chosen servant David and his posterity.—"The covenant relates to David's "seed;" and to the "establishment of his throne in that seed," literally "in Solomon for a time; spiritually in Christ, for ever—" "When thy days shall be fulfilled, ... I will set up thy "seed after thee. ... He shall build an house for my "name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for "ever. I will be his Father, and he shall be my son." These last words are cited by the apostle, Heb. i. 5, as "spoken of Christ, to evince his superiority over the angels. Yet that the whole passage does, in the letter, relate to Solomon, can admit of no doubt; he being the "seed" and immediate "successor" of David, and appointed to "build an house for God's name." Here then we have an incontestable proof that the covenant with David had Messiah for its object; that Solomon was a figure of him; and that the Scripture hath sometimes a "double sense." *Bp. Horne. V. 5. Notwithstanding present difficulties, the Psalmist was confident that God would perform such wonders in fulfilling his covenant, as would excite the praises of all the inhabitants of heaven; as well as cause his saints on earth in their assemblies to celebrate his faithfulness. (Notes, 6—12. 1. 4—6. xcvi. 3—7. Is. xlv. 23—28. Luke ii. 8—14. Eph. iii. 9—12. 1 Pet. i. 10—12. Rev. v. 8—14. xix. 1—6.)—Congregation of the saints. 7. Notes, Deut. xxxiii. 2. Jude 14—16.

V. 6—12. The majesty, holiness, wisdom, and power of God, infinitely excelling all the endowments of the noblest creatures, demand the reverential fear of all the assembled saints on earth, and of the angels who surround his throne in heaven; and accordingly “the assembly of his “holy ones,” all the holy worshippers in heaven stand in awe of him, abhor whatever would offend him, and worship him with the most profound veneration of his manifested glory: and his saints on earth ought, in the same spirit, to wait the event of their difficulties and trials. The word rendered “to be feared,” is translated reverend cxi. 9.—The Lord, by his “power” would certainly manifest his faithfulness: as he rules and bounds the raging ocean, which none else can govern; so would he restrain the progress of those enemies, who seemed about to swallow up his church with irresistible force and fury. “The extent of the ocean, the “multitude of its waves, and their fury, when excited by “a storm, render it in that state, the most tremendous “object in nature: nor doth any thing, which man beholds, “give him so just an idea, of human impotence, and of “that divine power, which can excite and calm so boisterous an element, at pleasure.” Bp. Horne. (Notes, lxxv. 6, 7. xciii. 3, 4. Job xxxviii. 8—11. Matt. viii. 23—27.)—

The God of Israel had formerly broken Rahab, (or Egypt,) and delivered his people, and afterwards crushed the nations of Canaan; and with his strong arm he was able to scatter their present enemies. (Note, Is. li. 9—11.) Being the Creator and Proprietor of heaven and earth, and having chosen Israel as his people; he would certainly make the land in all its parts, from north to south, from east to west, (which Tabor and Hermon, two distant mountains, represented,) to rejoice in his name, and resound with his praise.—Strong LORD. (8) JAH. Note, lxxviii. 4.

V. 13, 14. (Marg. Ref.) JEHOVAH's throne is established in justice and judgment: his almighty power and sovereign authority are always exercised in perfect justice and wisdom, and in entire consistency with his mercy and truth; and these mark out the path in which he walks with his people. “Thou dost not rule the world merely by thy “absolute power; but hast placed thy principal glory in “justice and equity, mercy and fidelity, from which thou “never swervest.” Bp. Patrick. “After this model should “the thrones of princes, and the tribunals of earthly magistrates be constituted in justice and judgment, adorned “with mercy and truth.” Bp. Horne. (Notes, xxv. 10. xlv. 6, 7. lxxxv. 10—13. lxxxvi. 14, 15. xciii. 1, 2. xcix. 4. John i. 17.)

V. 15—18. (Notes, Lev. xxv. 8—13.—P. O. Num. x. 1—10.) The sound of the sacred trumpets, calling the people to their solemn feasts, and announcing the year of jubilee, seems here alluded to. If the difference between that typical dispensation and the clear light of Christianity be duly considered; it will be allowed, that those who at-
